During the weeks abroad we two inquisitive American girls enjoyed Florence to the full, meeting Tomasso Salvini, the actor, Alma Tadema and his lovely daughters and a host of artists who frequented the formal salon of Mme. Steffani. While in London later I enjoyed the thrill of being given a big reception by Alma Tadema in his gorgeous palace of a home, to adorn which he had brought marbles from all over the world.

On my return to Chicago I was able to exhibit my work in marble and bronze. This was a big step, and again reviews commenced to appear in magazines and newspapers all over the country. "Her figurines take a place in sculpture that miniatures do in painting," "She has feminine quality; yet strength," "Her babies are among her triumphs," "Few sculptors have ever been able to model babyland, childhood, girlhood and womanhood with so exquisite a feeling for sentiment, grace and character"; so ran the comments.

All this was very cheering to a young sculptor just back from Europe with the bottom of her purse showing through the pennies. And it was encouraging to learn that the little plaster statuettes were selling briskly in Philadelphia and New York; inspiring to be made a member of the National Sculpture Society; and overwhelming to secure an order to do a heroic bust of Major-General S. W. Crawford for the Smith Memorial at Fairmont Park, Philadelphia, for which I was to receive eighteen hundred dollars.

THIS last bit of good fortune was decisive. I determined to burn my bridges behind me and move to New York City.

The work on the Crawford bust had just begun when to my great joy another fascinating order came to me. I was asked to do a life-size figure of Maude Adams, to be known as "The American Girl"; this was to be cast in solid gold and sent to the Paris Exposition of 1900.

To complicate things, on the 10th of May I became engaged to Mr. Robert W. Vonnoh, the painter—this betrothal being the culmination of a warm friendship we had carried on since the day when we had first met in Mr. Taft's studio in Chicago during preparations for the Fair.

"We can be engaged," I consented. And then thinking of the Maude Adams figure and the big bust, I added: "But we can't get married. Not now! I don't know when!"

Out of the lovers' discussion which followed came this modification of my former statement: I would marry him when the Crawford bust and the Maude Adams figure were done.

So I flung myself at my task with renewed vigor. So furiously did I work that Mr. Vonnoh became anxious and persuaded mother and me to leave the stifling city and go up to a country estate he owned at Rockland Lake, New York.

We had hardly arrived there when lovely, lovable Maude Adams arrived—surely the most piquant of guests. She had consented to remain with us until the figure was completed; and she did so, in spite of having to make frequent trips to New York for play rehearsals in the worst heat of the Summer. She was far from well, on the verge of a breakdown in fact. And the ordeal of giving me twenty-five sittings in that hot barn was terrific. But her whimsical fun never deserted her. She would tell us how she had wept coming up on the train, while the conductor sympathized, calling her "little girl" and imploring her to tell him all about it. Her tears had been those of utter physical weariness. Some of them would be shining in her eyes as she pictured the scene for us. And yet she would be rocking with laughter.

All the charm and winsomeness of her stage appearance, all the saucy impudence, all the exquisite pathos, we found were genuine, a part of her elfish self. She was like no one I have ever known, unless it be Eugene Field. And she resembled him in temperament only. Her work habits would have shamed his and those of most artists. She was an indefatigable worker, seldom wasting a moment. But her most notable characteristic was simplicity. It was almost a fault. She would buy an expensive hat on Fifth Avenue, pull the trimming off of it until it was nearly bare, and then wear it, no matter how it looked.

The day after the Crawford and Adams pieces were finished, Mr. Vonnoh and I were married.

IN 1904 I had the joy of receiving the Julia A. Shaw prize for "Enthroned." I was elected a member of the Society of American Artists. And the Cincinnati Museum purchased two of my bronzes.

But the outstanding event of the year for me was the Universal Exposition at St. Louis, where Mr. Vonnoh was to serve on the jury for paintings. I was asked to substitute as a juror, and was the only woman on the great jury composed of artists from all over the world. We sat there in a circle, voting prizes.

It was a delightful experience, crammed with funny little happenings. The men, being mere men as well as artists, were perpetually hungry. And I being just a substitute, and a woman, would be delegated to slip out and bring in things to eat. They passed on the pictures; I passed the sandwiches. Next to me sat Mr. Joseph Pennell, who smoked continuously yet was never able to find a match. One day when his hands were full he begged me, like a big boy:

"Won't you please find a match for me in my pocket?"

I tried to, diving my hand deep down in his coat pocket. But the pocket was gone;

"My second child is much stronger than my first"

Little chapters from the story of how the Arch Preserver Shoe changed the ideas of a Nation. No. 10

THERE is a young mother in Pittsburgh whose ideal of success is to rear healthy children.

She believes, and many will agree with her, that the greatest success she can attain is to bring up her children perfectly fitted physically and mentally to cope with the problems of the world. She was blessed with unusual energy, with a wholesome and cheerful disposition, and a husband who returned her great love.

Yet, their first child was weak and puny. The physician often would shake his head discouragingly when he examined it.

"You must have been in a run down condition before it was born," he said. "There is a cause for everything."

"But I've never been sick a day in my life," she replied.

"Perhaps not. But I imagine your nerves were on edge, and that you worried."

"Well, my feet seemed to hurt me worse in those days. And I tired easily. I supposed that was customary." Then she continued: "I still find it tiresome to go clear through the day. By night I'm dreadfully worn out, I suppose I'll get over it, though."

He advised her to wear the Arch Preserver Shoe. She has worn it the past three years. Recently she wrote a friend: My second child is much stronger than the first!"

It may appear to be an extravagant claim that the shoes of the mother have much to do with children. But the mother who is active, comfortable and vigorous, will usually have strong, robust children. The Arch Preserver Shoe has helped a great many mothers, by keeping their feet free from strain, from cramps, from abuse. The young mother, both before and after the birth of her child, must be on her feet a great deal. Just a little strain on her foot arches means touchy nerves, lines in her face, a gloomy view-point — and eventually a "run down" condition.

This shoe, because of a concealed, built-in arch bridge, affords a natural support under the entire foot, just as when the foot rests on the ground. There can be no strain on the ligaments of the arch, no matter how much a woman stands or walks. Even the longest, most trying day does not cause undue fatigue.

Further, because of the flat inner sole, another exclusive feature, there is no pinching of the nerves, blood-vessels and bones of the forepart of the foot. This promotes circulation of the blood, and improves the general health of the foot. In fact, any normal, healthy woman wearing this shoe feels a constant urge to do things, to be active — and she enjoys everything so much more.

It is easy to understand why that Pittsburgh mother could say: "My second child is much stronger than the first." She was a more capable mother, better fitted to be a mother. And last summer this young Pittsburgh mother with her two children and her husband motored across the continent. They had a fine time — even with two small children along.

Sitting in the dining room of a Seattle Hotel, he looked across the table at her. "You're years younger than when we were married. And you're prettier, too."

That statement implied, of course, that her costume was entirely what it should have been. Her Arch Preserver Shoes were to all outward appearances just good-looking high quality shoes, smartly styled.

That's the fine thing about the Arch Preserver Shoe. It gives foot health and vigor and at the same time it affords style. A woman enjoys it doubly. There should be no reason why the young mother — or any other woman — should have to dress plainly just because she wishes to retain her youth and vigor. This explains why the Arch Preserver Shoe has achieved the greatest success in the shoe industry, why thousands and thousands of women demand it and will wear nothing else. And just as it keeps the feet youthful, it also retains its own "new" appearance. So long as you wear an Arch Preserver Shoe you will find that it holds its neat, trim shapeliness.

The modern woman is good-looking. She demands style in her apparel, and rightly so. It is her birthright to look well. But she also is acquiring a new measure of independence and self-reliance.

Therefore she demands good health. It is no longer a mark of distinction for women to be weakly. The fainting woman has passed. In her stead is the active, capable woman of today, who does things well, who enjoys her duties along with her pleasures.

And such women wear the Arch Preserver Shoe because they have learned that it helps them as no other shoe can.

TEARS AND LAUGHTER

and everything was caught in the lining of the coat. I began to haul things out, pencils, crayons, cigarets, everything but a match. It was pathetic. Here was a man far from home where his wife couldn't mend his clothes. I made this comment to him, and he turned on me slowly, like an indignant baby:

"Mend my clothes? My wife has something better to do than mend my clothes," he declared. "I wouldn't let her."

Later I told the story to Mrs. Pennell in London; and she expressed great surprise and amusement. She was interested to know his views, especially as she was forever mending his clothes. It was a job she never seemed to finish.

Another interesting experience which came out of serving on the jury at the St. Louis Exposition was becoming acquainted with a cultured gentleman, Prince Iwamura, of Tokio. The prince wanted me to come to Japan to do the Empress. I was unable to comply, but apparently his feelings toward me were still kindly, for a little later he wrote an article about a piece of mine which is in the Tokio Museum. He sent me a copy of the Japanese magazine containing the article; and I had it translated by a Japanese artist. The translation in part read as follows:

> She looks upon it since her early art life that ornamental sculpture is suitable to the condition of present generation, and especially for female sculpture. By this reason she endeavors to figure mother and infant chiefly.
> This is her lately works how female observation which male can not obtain is sagacious, and how sculpturous characteristic is so interest seen on this image.

SHORTLY after our return to New York we moved into our present big studio apartment. There I enjoyed domesticity, though doubtless it makes a more sensational appeal to present artists as erratic, like Whistler, with his long delicate canes and his lock of hair tied with ribbon, living disordered lives, not conforming to the rules of society. And just another word about home life and the artist. I owe more to my mother and husband than I can ever repay. My mother's quick judgment, her frankness when I am not doing my best, her unfailing encouragement and her devotion, such as only a mother can give—all these have helped to make my success possible. Nor can I ever be too thankful for the wonderful bond of sympathy and understanding which the love of art creates between my husband and myself. I can always depend upon his helpful criticism in my work; and sometimes I am of the same service to him.

In Lyme, Connecticut, a famous old art colony where Mr. Vonnoh and I had gone for the Summer, we became acquainted with the Woodrow Wilson family. Mr. Wilson was president of Princeton at the time and his wife and daughters were summering at Miss Florence Griswold's boarding-house.

On the heels of that Summer at Lyme there followed several years so packed with stirring human experiences that I shall not attempt to describe them. Several incidents stand out as especially significant, but the experience, of all others, which brings tears of sadness to my eyes, was our visit to Mr. St. Gaudens's home in Cornish, New Hampshire.

It was really a visit to say good-by, for he was dying. We knew he was very ill, but we hoped to be allowed to see him for a brief moment. Up until that time they had been carrying him down-stairs every now and then, so he could direct the people who were going on with his work. But all this had stopped, and we learned when we arrived that no one was ever allowed up-stairs.

I felt heartbroken. I was determined to send him some last message. So I went out on his lawn, hunted till I found a four-leaved clover, and sent it up to him—a little harbinger of good cheer and good luck.

My many travels during these years were filled with delightful and amusing encounters everywhere. I shall never forget, for instance, the dear soul who wanted a portrait of her bald husband. He and she were quite old, although recently married. And he was the baldest-headed man I have ever seen in my life. I undertook the bust, but had barely started when one day she came in, with timid apologies, to ask a favor. "I'm treating Henry's head with vaseline," she said, "and if you'll look very close you'll see the little hairs growing out. I'm sure it's coming. So will you please put the hair on?"

I ARRIVED in New York from one trip to discover awaiting me a commission to do the heroic bust of Vice-President Sherman for the Senate Chamber. So I hurried home to Washington, and here I was given the Vice-President's committee-room in the new Senate Office Building to work in. The palatial empty room reminded me of the song "I Dreamt I Dwelt in Marble Halls," with its great columns and crystal chandelier. Vice-President Sherman, however, dubbed it "The Mud-Hole," from my tub of clay. And here—in the Mud-Hole—he slumbered through the hours of posing.

After this Winter in Washington there followed two years given over to more travel, and then in 1913 the Brooklyn Museum of Art invited me to make an exhibition of my work. I complied. And my exhibit, together with a special exhibition of paintings, was opened with an evening reception which was a very large and formal affair.

In 1920 I won the John J. Agar prize at the exhibition of the Society of Women Sculptors and Painters. Besides, I produced "Bird Fountain," "Adolescence," "Will of the Wisp," "Primavera," "Allegresse," "La Petite," and "Portrait of Aldis Squier."

The year which followed, 1921, brought honors for which I shall always be humbly grateful. First, my bird fountain was purchased and placed in a memorial bird sanctuary at Ormond Beach Park, Florida. "Allegresse" was bought by the Detroit Museum, and I was awarded the Elizabeth N. Watrous gold medal at the National Academy of Design. However, what mattered infinitely more to me—since it was the greatest honor I have ever had—I was elected an Academician. At that time only one woman sculptor and two women painters were members. Mr. Vonnoh had long been a member. So when I was elected it made us the first husband and wife to become members. We are still the only ones.

Our reaction from these years of strain and hard work was such that, for a year or two, we played, and played hard. In 1922 we gave original, elaborate parties for which we were often weeks preparing. Among them was our "Jungle Party" when a howling, unrecognizable horde of jungle creatures packed our studios. One of them was Will Beebe, the famous explorer, and another was Mr. Carl Akeley, the great African explorer and sculptor.

That year our gaiety did not end in May. We carried it to our little country home at Lyme, and all Summer the small house was overflowing with guests. As maids were hard to keep, I dispensed with them entirely and put my guests to work. All must do something. I explained this when they arrived.

"But what can I do?" asked Mr. Akeley.

I considered, then set him to catching moles. Why have a big-game hunter around, and waste him, when we were overrun with moles? I got him a beautiful new trap which cost a dollar, and he began. He would rise at dawn and pursue the policy of watchful waiting, but nothing ever happened. I became sorry for him. We all assured him we understood at last why he was able to get big game—elephants and tigers. They were so big he couldn't possibly miss them. But when it came to the real tactics of hunting, the real finesse, he could not make the grade. At last I suggested kindly, "You might go indoors and swat the flies." So he did.

In 1923 Mr. Vonnoh and I went to France for the first time since the war, and made a long stay at our little house at Grez. We returned on the Leviathan with many old friends, among them Mr. Stefansson, the Arctic explorer. I shall never forget Mr. Stefansson's amazing ideas about eating:

"One ought to decide on a well-balanced combination and then eat it at every meal, as a horse eats oats. Why not? In the Arctic they live on blubber," he is in the habit of declaring emphatically to his friends.

I had heard him say this, and I determined, there on the Leviathan, to watch him and see if he really lived up to his theory. Incredible as it may seem, he did. Every morning for breakfast he ordered sausage with strawberry jam spread on it, and as long as we were on board ship he never varied this horrible menu.

Around the luxurious private swimming-pool much of the social life of Hollywood centers. Here the stars meet to discuss their work and talk over each other's productions.

THREE HUNDRED and FIFTY-TWO STARS at HOLLYWOOD tell why they are using this soap for their skin

HOW do the stars at Hollywood take care of their skin? How do they keep it smooth, soft, exquisite, in spite of the constant use of make-up and the cruel exposure to high-power artificial light?

We interviewed over 480 stars at Hollywood on the subject of what toilet soap they select for the care of their skin, and why they prefer it.

Woodbury's fourteen times as popular as any other soap

Three hundred and fifty-two, or nearly three-fourths of the entire number of women interviewed, said they were using Woodbury's Facial Soap. The largest number using any other one soap was 26.

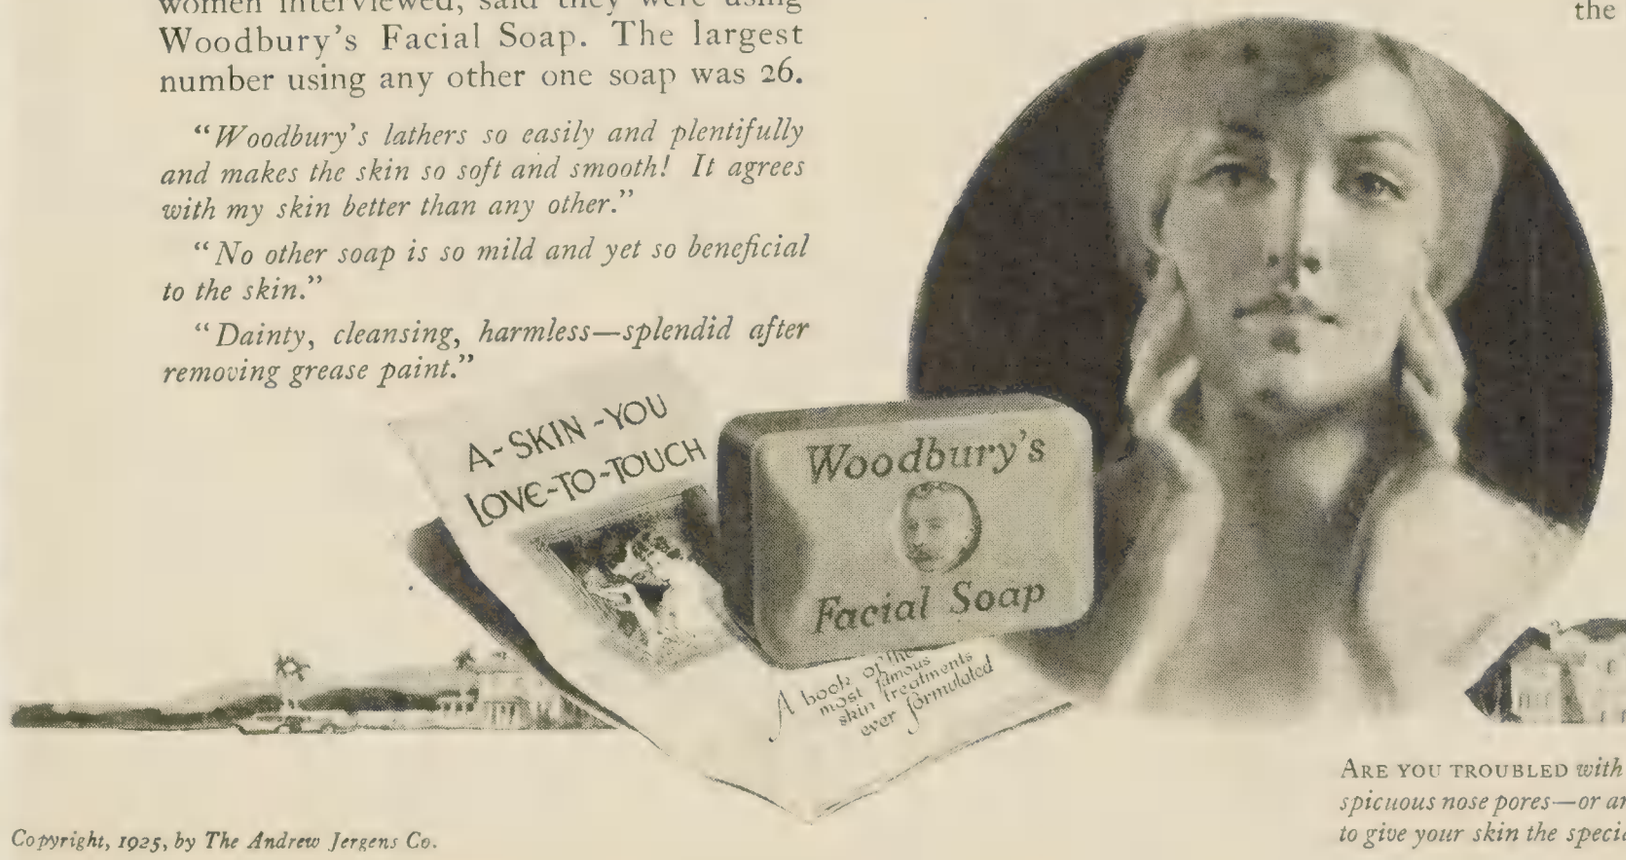
"Woodbury's lathers so easily and plentifully and makes the skin so soft and smooth! It agrees with my skin better than any other."

"No other soap is so mild and yet so beneficial to the skin."

"Dainty, cleansing, harmless—splendid after removing grease paint."

"My skin is extremely sensitive on account of using make-up continually. I find Woodbury's Soap the least irritating of all."

"I find it best for my skin. It keeps the skin free from blackheads, enlarged pores, etc., and keeps it firm and smooth."



These were some of the comments volunteered by the Hollywood stars.

A skin specialist worked out the formula by which Woodbury's is made. This formula not only calls for absolutely pure ingredients. It also demands greater refinement in the manufacturing process than is commercially possible with ordinary toilet soap. In merely handling a cake of Woodbury's one notices this extreme fineness.

Around each cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap is wrapped a booklet containing special cleansing treatments for overcoming common skin defects. A 25c cake lasts a month or six weeks.

Within a week or ten days after beginning to use Woodbury's you will see an improvement in your complexion.

This Restores Beauty to soiled furniture finishes and other woodwork

IT IS easy to make every wood surface in your home clean, brilliant and beautiful with O-Cedar Polish. To prove that, go today to your store and get a small bottle of O-Cedar Polish and when you return home, just apply a little of the polish to a particularly obstinate soiled spot—don't rub the polish in, simply lay it on—then, after a moment, rub firmly with a well moistened cloth. The effect is magical! The soil comes off and the original beauty of the wood beneath reappears.

When you see this result you won't rest until you do the same thing for every door, every piece of woodwork, every furniture finish all through your home. And once the wood surfaces are cleaned and renewed you simply polish occasionally with O-Cedar on a dry cloth to keep them lustrous and beautiful.

There is nothing like O-Cedar. Years of success have established it as the most marvelous cleaner and restorative in the world for all wood surfaces. A secret formula makes it utterly harmless to the most sensitive finish. Wonderful for automobiles. Sold everywhere with a money-back guarantee.

TEARS AND LAUGHTER

Senator Owen, another old friend also on board, told me something about the famous Indian, ex-Governor Allen Wright, who had long ago suggested to my mother as a musical middle name for me the Indian word "Onahotema," meaning: "She gives with an open hand." The name appealed to my mother, so Bessie Onahotema Potter I became or "Bessie O What-A-Name Potter," as Mr. Hamlin Garland used to insist on calling it.

IMMEDIATELY on arriving in New York I received word that I had been chosen to do the Roosevelt Memorial—a bird fountain in memory of our beloved ex-President, to be placed at the entrance of the Roosevelt Memorial Bird Sanctuary at Oyster Bay. The tract of land for this sanctuary was a gift to the Audubon Society from Mr. Emlin Roosevelt, and it adjoins the little cemetery in which Theodore Roosevelt is buried.

The fountain, I was advised, must not only serve as a memorial, but must also be of practical use, refreshing the hosts of little winged travelers who will pause in the sanctuary for rest and refuge on their long flights between north and south. With these brief instructions I was bidden to work out a theme, although it would be impossible to decide definitely on anything until the return of Mrs. Roosevelt, who was then away on a trip around the world.

I returned home and began earnestly to develop an idea. Anything formal or pretentious, I knew, would be out of place. Roosevelt was simple. He loved flowers, birds, the out-of-doors. And this fountain for birds was to commemorate his love for such things—especially for the winged folk whom he did so much to protect. It was along these lines I began to plan, and gradually it came to me that I must use children on the fountain, for the same reason that we put flowers on a grave. Children are like flowers.

Also, I must get into my concept all the joyousness of the woods and fields—birds, animals, growing things. So I graded the theme upward, from the earth to animal life, to physical life, and finally to the spiritual, to the ideal of service. When my sketch was made in clay, I summoned the people on the committee.

"Not what we want," they said.

So I made ten other sketches, each different. And they selected one of a young girl with her hand up, holding a bird. I liked it the least. I didn't want to do it. So I put it away for the time, and went ahead with my original theme. When the large model was ready, I again submitted it. Again the committee hesitated. So there was nothing to do but settle down to wait for Mrs. Roosevelt's return.

She came directly to my New York studio from the boat, accompanied by her daughter and two of her sons and their wives. I was impressed with her quiet dignity and simplicity. She was so genuine, so real. I trembled a little. Of course she had understood Roosevelt as no one else ever had. She would know. Would my fountain stand the test? Before showing it to her I determined to make it easy for her to reject it in case it didn't please her. For I could not bear the thought that, being lovely and considerate, she might take the piece for fear of hurting me. So I showed her a letter from Mrs. Bacon, widow of our former Ambassador to France, in which Mrs. Bacon said she had seen photographs of the fountain, and that in case it should not be accepted as the Roosevelt Memorial she wanted it for the bird sanctuary near the Children's Library which she was erecting in memory of Colonel Bacon.

"So please," I begged, "feel perfectly free to refuse it."

Mrs. Roosevelt nodded quietly, graciously. And I led the way to the studio where the fountain stood. As we came before the piece, the young people made a suggestion or two about the basin.

"Oh, no," said Mrs. Roosevelt, "that is symbolical of the offering."

Then she fell silent. For a long moment she stood before the memorial, apparently too moved to speak. At last she turned to me, with a smile I shall never forget.

"Tell Mrs. Bacon to let you make something else for her," she entreated.

I consented, overjoyed to think I had pleased her.

ONE day, a little later, she came to the sanctuary to meet me, so we could go over the grounds together. Again she was a lesson in simplicity. It was a mile and a half from her home to the sanctuary, and apparently she had walked it briskly. She is known at Oyster Bay as a great walker, and can be seen almost any day, a cane or a gray Italian umbrella in her hand and her little dog following her, moving along the road which leads past her husband's grave to her daughter's home just beyond. On this day when she came to meet me we looked first for the spot at the entrance to the sanctuary where the fountain could stand.

"I think it ought to be right on the road, where every one will see it," she urged. And she added after a moment: "I know you'll receive many letters about it."

It was my desire that the fountain should be placed back a little way, hidden from the road, but accessible by a foot-path. She agreed that this would be lovelier, but in that case a guard would be needed to protect the fountain and the shrubbery around it.

And when I assured her that the American public would consider it a privilege, an opportunity, to provide such a guard, she seemed troubled lest this might prove a burden.

LEAVING the sanctuary, we strolled over to the simple grave, marked only by its headstone and iron fence. Here, on an ordinary day, fifteen hundred people come to pay their respects, five thousand or more visiting it on Sunday. It is impossible to keep flowers about. Roosevelt lovers take them away. From where we stood we could look out to the beach where Roosevelt used to picnic with his children, making fires and cooking suppers on the big boulders. I suggested as we stood there, that we take one of these boulders, inscribe on it the facts about the Bird Sanctuary, and place it at the entrance to the sanctuary. She nodded agreement. But her thoughts were far away. Presently she began to speak to me about her husband.

"We were always so busy living," she said quietly, "that we never gave much thought to just where we were to be buried."

I was silent. And she added after a moment, a little sadly:

"But of course I knew what he wanted—what he would have preferred. When we were younger, we used to say we were going to be buried where only the other one would know. That was our ideal, the dream of our earlier years. But when he died—of course I knew that was out of the question."

We stood quietly there for a long moment, then walked down to the road. Here she said good-by, and I watched her swing away, a vigorous, solitary figure, the umbrella in her hand, the little dog at her heels.

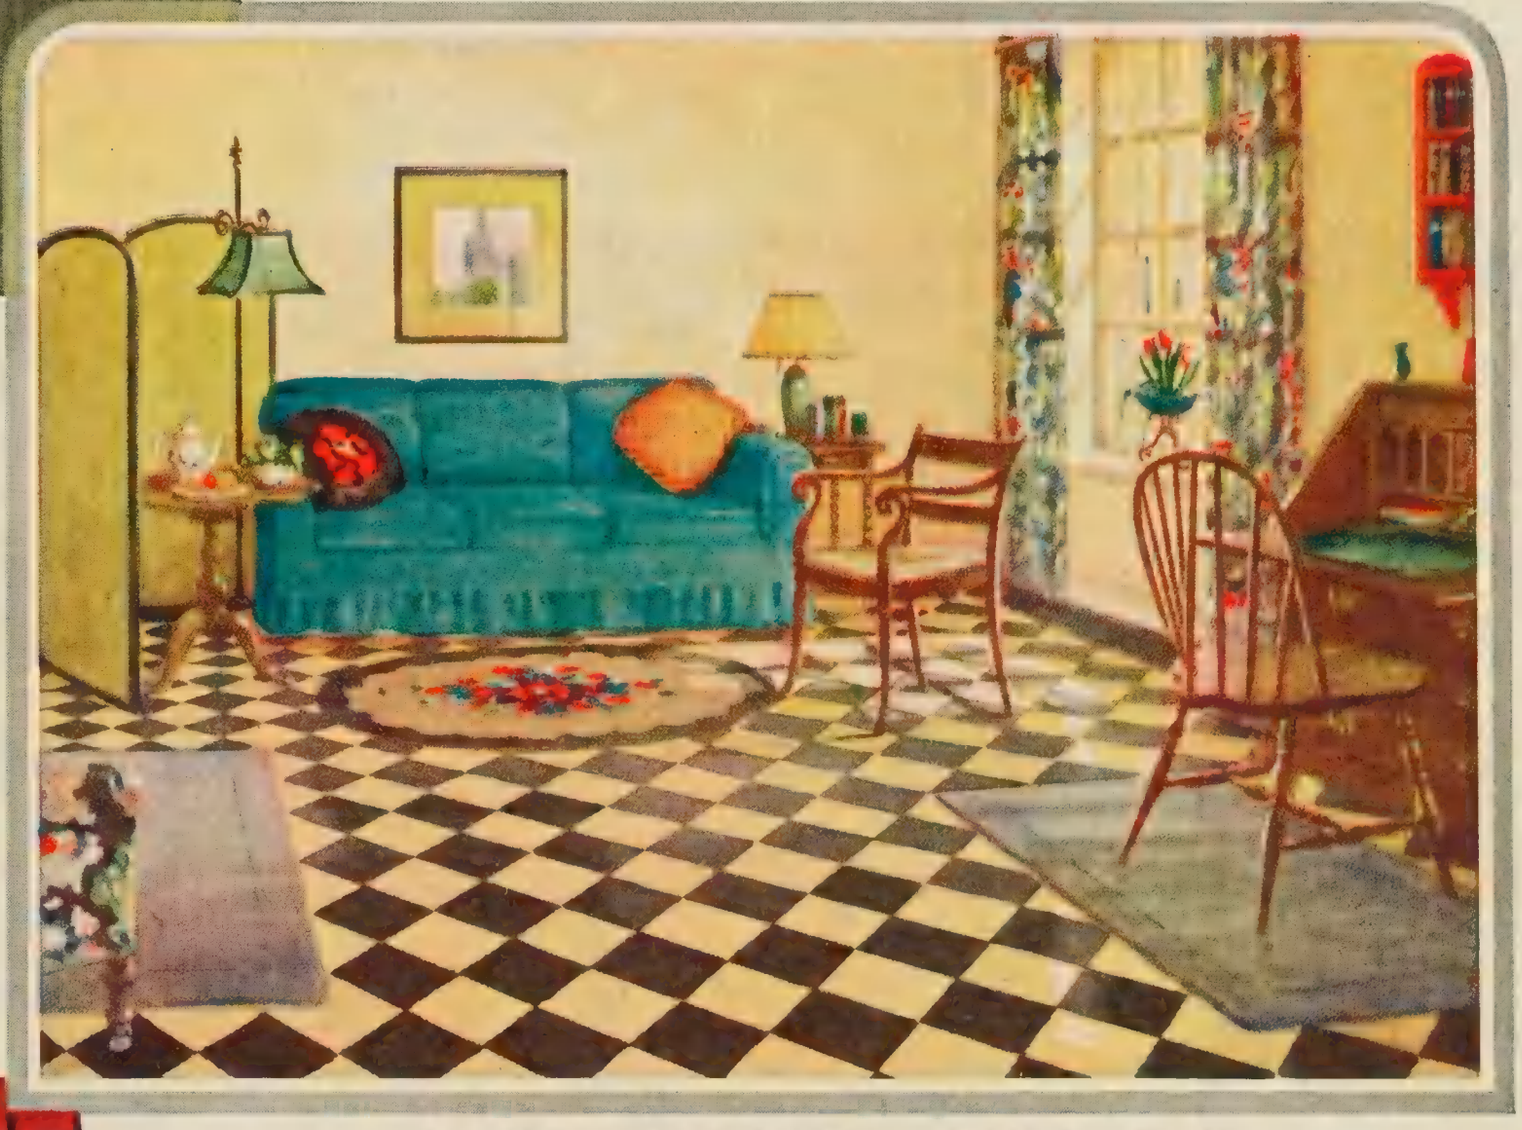
New book on home decoration

AN authoritative book entitled "Floors, Furniture, and Color" has been written by Agnes Foster Wright, a prominent contributor to House and Garden and other leading magazines. It discusses in a practical, interesting way the proper use of color in home interiors. This new book will be sent to anyone for 25 cents (in Canada, 60 cents). Address Armstrong Cork Company, Linoleum Division, 868 W. Walnut St., Lancaster, Pa.

TODAY pretty floors are so easy to have! Before you spend another penny to paint or refinish your old wood floors, see with your own eyes these new pattern floors in Armstrong's Linoleum that interior decorators and architects are using for modern interiors.

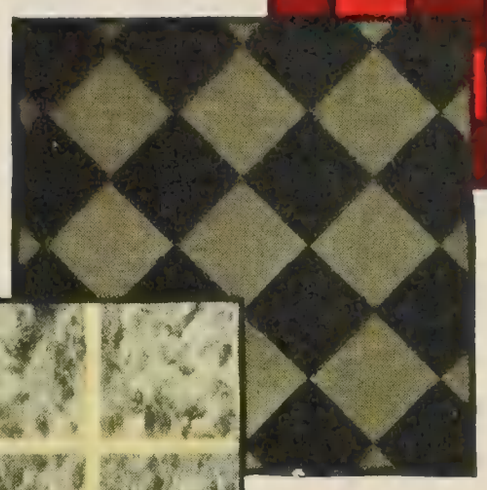


A few colors and designs are shown on this page. These and a host of other designs in Armstrong's Linoleum Floors are now on display at good furniture and department stores.

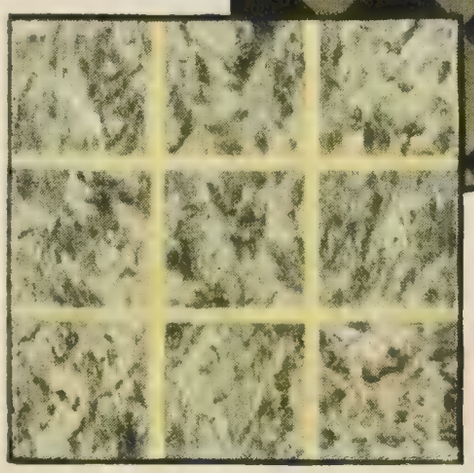
These new floors of color will brighten your home as they lighten your housework. They can be laid quickly right over your old floors without bother or muss. First a lining of builders' deadening felt is pasted over the footworn boards. Then the linoleum is firmly cemented in place, its seams and edges tightly sealed with waterproof cement.

No floor scrubbing — no refinishing

Laid this permanent way, all your linoleum floor needs to keep it bright and new-looking is an occasional waxing (not more than once or twice a year) and a daily dusting with a dry mop. It never has to be scrubbed. It never needs refinishing.



The charming living-room you see here is a striking example of the correct use of a floor of color and design. The decorator who planned this room had in mind the purpose and spirit of the room when she selected the smart floor of Armstrong's Black and Cream Linoleum (Pattern No. 350). She also remembered that the whole color plan should be based on the foundation of color established by the patterned floor. As a result the room is invested with a captivating formality, yet it does not have the cold character that a less skilfully chosen foundation might have conveyed.



A floor of Armstrong's Black and Cream Inlaid Linoleum, No. 350.

Once you see the many new patterns, many equally attractive decorative ideas will suggest themselves for your own home. For in Armstrong's Linoleum you will find correct colors and designs for any type of home, any kind of room.

ARCOLA
Reg.U.S Pat.Off.

"ONE who did not know ARCOLA would think it an ordinary radiator," writes Dr. Frank O. Hetrick of Ottawa, Kansas—it is so small and compact, warming the room in which it stands as well as furnishing its hot-water heat to the radiators.

"In fact," continues Dr. Hetrick, "one woman said to us: 'But you told me you had no basement, and where is your boiler?' We pointed to the ARCOLA Heating Outfit in the dining room and said nothing. To which the lady replied: 'Well, who ever would have believed that little thing would warm a chicken coop even?'"

And yet, as Dr. Hetrick and thousands of other owners warmly testify, ARCOLA fills the whole house with even, healthful, hot-water warmth. So scientifically is it designed, that it does the work of several stoves on no more fuel than is ordinarily used in one.

Is your home without a basement? Install ARCOLA and enjoy radiator warmth. Are you planning a small home? Omit the cellar and install ARCOLA instead. Are you wasting fuel with an inefficient heater? Install ARCOLA and it will begin at once to save fuel.

You can afford ARCOLA; any home can. By our Easy Payment Plan your Heating and Plumbing store can install it complete with piping and radiators for only a small down payment. The balance you pay in ten easy monthly installments.

Ask the nearest Heating and Plumbing store for a free ARCOLA estimate for your home or building. Meanwhile send for our helpful book on modern warmth.

Kirsch Curtain Rods

Something Finer in Curtain Rods

Setting a New Standard

Kirsch Curtain Rods in StippleTone finish are more beautiful, more artistic, and more durable—they are equipped with stronger, more practical brackets—yet for all their greater beauty and value, they cost less than the standard Kirsch Rod of the past.

Kirsch Curtain Rods provide the most practical aid in window draping. Easy to put up; easy to take down; fit every window; take care of every treatment. Only Kirsch offers such advantages as: The distinctive StippleTone finish, that is rich and silk-like; the one-piece extension section for building up rods of any length; the pilot that guides the rod smoothly into the curtain casings; the "Snug-fit" brackets, invisible in use, that hold the rods firmly in place.

"There is no substitute for Kirsch Quality and Service"

Be sure to get the genuine. Look for (1) The name "Kirsch" on the Rod; (2) The StippleTone finish; (3) The distinctive Three-Color Box.

again for a pencil. There was no letter from Andrew, she cried, but there was a registered letter for which she had to sign. "Didn't I say my walk was going to bring me luck!"

He laughed, and then stated the hope that it had reached the country soon enough and that gave her the excuse (he afterward remembered) for making a mystery of it and refusing to tell him what the letter was. Her fun now was in setting him to guess and at every guess declaring it to be much, much more marvelous than that; and off and on she kept this up, her glee at its highest, until in the afternoon they went over to tea at the Englands'.

She did the walk handsomely; Sim admitted that to her; but during tea, glancing at her, he thought she was looking a little fagged—and rain coming on settled the question, there could be no idea of walking back. The Englands' car was out of action. Sim telephoned the situation to Staverton Park, but learned that none of the cars there would be back from a house-party excursion until ten or eleven that night; immediately a car was in, it should be sent over. This meant staying on for dinner. But dinner and the late coming of the car meant staying also for the family prayers. Dinner came, the family prayers came (Sim gave Linda no warning of them), the car came. On the drive back Linda's comment was a single word.

She said nothing at all for two miles or more, nor did he; he was wondering what she would say and a little dreading it. Then suddenly she asked abruptly: "Did you know they were going to have family prayers, Sim?"

"Yes, I knew that. What about it, Linda?"

"Rum," said Linda.

But on the morrow she referred again to the subject. It was at Staverton Park. Sim had taken her up there to tea; he himself was staying only half an hour because he had promised old Yeoman to help in the great event of carting the fourth seat to the fourth hill. Tables were set for cards as he was going and he went across to Linda's four as he was leaving and told her that he was off. The hand had just been played. It appeared that Linda had not played her cards as she might and her table, debating the hand, was telling her so. A woman at another table caught the remarks. "You can't expect poor Linda to be in her best form," she called across the room. "You know where the car went for her last night—at those Englands. They say family prayers there with the servants every night, all down on their benders with their arms round one another's necks. Enough to put any one off their form."

There was laughter—and the speaker, encouraged, went on: "Yes, rather. Linda, do tell us, did you go down on your benders and do the holy holy, too?"

Linda turned about in her chair, quick, as one stung.

"Yes, I did. Do you mind?"

Her tone caused the lady slightly to flush. "Not a bit, if you don't. I'd love to have seen you. Do they all pray in turn? Did you have to speak?"

Linda put her hand on the back of her chair the better to face toward her questioner. "No, but I'll speak now, to you," she cried. Her face was white, her voice passionate. "And it is like a fishwife I am going to speak to you. Shut your mouth, I'm going to say. Shut your mouth, because what you're saying with it ought to make you and any of us sick and ashamed that we couldn't do what you are sneering at if we tried. If I had kids (which, thank God for their sakes, I haven't), I wish to God I might be capable (which I never could be) of bringing them up just like that. But if I can't do it and even if I don't want to do it, I don't laugh at it—and if you want to laugh at it go into some sink of your own and laugh—not where I am."

She stopped and she remained glaring, breathing hard, and the silence was embarrassing.

Lady Millicent broke it. "Oh, let's get on with the games. What are you two jabbering about?"

No reference was made by Linda to the scene when she came back in the evening. But Sim all day had had it in his mind—another revelation of this lovely, lightsome creature.

IN THE days that followed her quietness continued and, contrasted with the gaiety of the beginning of her stay, was strange, he thought.

But something further happened to worry Sim, just two days before the tremendous occasion of Linda's return to Andrew who now, deprived of her so long, was writing hungry letters to her daily. Riding abroad that afternoon Sim had been near Chesney Towers and had met Stupendity guests, also riding. Lardy Quinnet was the only one known to him and in introducing the others, one (but Sim had recognized him at once) was presented as Sir Toridd Lesson.

"Your first time in this part of the world?" Sim asked him, exchanging courtesies.

"My first," agreed Sir Toridd, "right here, as they taught me to say in the States. I know the neighborhood. I was over at Shifney a fortnight ago."

He was a very big man, heavy faced, massively built.

"Ah, staying with people?" Sim asked.

"No, only the night at the local pub. I was driving my car and she broke down. Linda Paris still with you?"

Entirely unexpected, the question gave Sim a start and sharp annoyance.

"My sister-in-law, Mrs. Paris, is with me, yes," he said coldly.

It was one of Sir Toridd Lesson's chief assets on the road of success that he not only never felt a snub, but that he did not recognize one when he heard it.

"Ah, I'll likely look in and pay my respects while I'm here," he said jovially.

SIM nudged his horse with his knees and turned away.

Linda was lying down on the couch before the fire in the sitting-room when he returned. The 'Orrid Lesson was hotly in his mind when he entered the room and he would have voiced his annoyance immediately but for Linda's position, lying there. She said drowsily, "Hullo, old boy."

Drowsily? No, wearily. He went beside her. "Linda, you sound ill, you look ill."

Her eyes were closed. She opened those most lovely eyes of hers and smiled at him.

"I'm all right, old boy," she said.

She closed her eyes again.

"Linda, you are not. You have been looking rotten these last days. Nothing up with you, is there, old girl?"

She murmured. "Quite all right, dear old Sim."

"It's not, Linda. You have been frightfully listless a long time."

Still with her eyes shut she stretched up a hand to him. "Quite all right, Sim."

But her touch—that soft white hand—worsened his uneasiness.

"Linda, your hand is very hot."

The murmur: "Just the fire, Sim."

He touched her lovely face. "It's not the fire. Linda, you're feverish."

He adjusted the cushions beneath her golden head. "Linda, I think I will get the doctor."

Her murmur: "There's not the least reason, old boy. Fit as a fiddle to-morrow."

He did not like it. To rally her, he said brightly: "By Jove, you will have to be. The day after, you are going to Andrew, remember—you have got to be your best for that."

It did rally her. She opened her eyes wide and she almost smiled the radiant smile. "Oh, haven't I, and oh, won't I be! Sim, when Andrew sees me again——"

But still he did not like it. He stood perturbed.

She would not hear of the doctor—she would eat no dinner.

He asked her once, "Pain, old girl?" She said she felt a little sick, and appendicitis was in his mind.

"Only my back, Sim. My back hurts."

The meal was cleared. He tried to read. She seemed to doze.

"Lovely!" she murmured.

He asked her, "Eh, Linda?"

But she seemed to be talking in her sleep—and presently again: "Lovely—aren't I—Andrew?"

A Brick Home at YOUR Price

YOUR brick home need cost no more than the lowest priced type of construction.

New methods of laying brick have created walls that use fewer brick and are strong, safe and dry. They give a range in price that meets every purse. All have the same beautiful exteriors as the finest brick homes. All have the ability of burned clay to last for centuries without painting or repair. Write for literature on newest uses of Common Brick.

At any of the addresses listed below you will find men of practical experience who will gladly explain the several types of brick walls developed by this association. They will help you secure bids that, again, smash the fallacy that brick is expensive.

These Books and Plans Have Helped Thousands

You may find exactly the home you want among the 120 shown in our two plan books—"Your Next Home" and "The Home You Can Afford." (10c each). Plans at nominal cost for every home shown. "Brick, How to Build and Estimate" is a hand-book on brick construction invaluable to home builders. Describes various types of brick walls. (25c a copy). "Skintled Brickwork" shows latest effects in rough texture walls. (15c a copy). Send 60c for all four books. "Brick Silos—and How to Build Them." A complete text book on most economical type silos—10c.

Play for Children Work for Shoes

Do you ever wonder whether your child gets a "rake-off" from the shoe man? It's astonishing how quickly some children wear out their shoes.

But, not those who wear Acrobats! The long wear of these shoes is insured by genuine oak-tanned soles, durable uppers, triple stitching and the Acrobat "Double Welt" patented construction.

Acrobats "KEEP children's feet as Nature made them!" Their easy, natural fit provides uncramped room for toes, and developing the little foot-muscles. The flexible soles lend grace and poise to their movements, strengthening the arches. And the "Double Welt" construction keeps the insoles flat and smooth, free from hurting wrinkles.

ACROBAT SHOES

are the shoes for your older children! And BALANCERS for the little folks (sizes 2 to 8). And then: "Andrew—Andrew——"

And then: "Am I not lovely—Andrew?"

About ten she suddenly sat up. "I'm going up-stairs a minute, old boy."

She was a long time away. When she appeared again, she came to the couch and sat down rather suddenly.

"Sim, I've been sick."

"Sick!"

She nodded. "Oh, sick as a dog!"

She shuddered.

Sim said: "It frightens me horribly. Sure the tummy's all right?"

"It's only my back, Sim—my back and my head."

She lay down. "Don't fuss me, old boy."

The next thing was that she would go to bed. Sim went to her room when he knew she was in bed. She was lying in a face-down attitude, her lovely head a golden, gleaming thing upon the pillow beneath the candle that he held.

"I'm better now. I'm thinking of Andrew and when he sees me."

The next thing was that in the night he awoke to hear her calling him: "Sim—Sim!"

A most piteous and a most dreadful sound, filling him with fear: "Sim—Sim—oh, Sim!"

He struck a light and immediately was with her. The shocking disorder of a fevered sleeper's bed was here—and on the bed, one by a fever terribly consumed.

"Linda!"

"Oh, Sim, I'm ghastly ill."

She was lying on her back. Only her night-dress covered her.

"My poor, poor girl."

"Oh, Sim!"

He stooped above her and as the candle's light came full upon her face he had a new and terrible dismay.

"Linda!"

An awful thought was in his mind—his tone expressed his fear.

"Oh, Sim—what's happened to me, Sim?"

Her night-dress, open at the throat, slightly revealed her breast. He put his hand to it and drew it farther down. Spottings in angry scarlet flush were there—among them small deep-purple spots.

"Linda! Good God!"

Dumbed by his shock, his cry was scarcely uttered.

"Oh, Sim, what has happened to me?"

He dare not say. He set down the candle. "I think I'd best go straight for the doctor."

His heart made prayer.

SOON he was outside and making for the doctor.

He knew the doctor well and liked him; and the doctor's voice, immediately on his recognition of Sim, changed from the short and irritated. "Well? What is it? Who's there?" to "What, Paris? What's up, old man? What's wrong?"

"It's my sister-in-law, doctor," Sim said. "She's in a frightful fever. She looks to me mighty bad. She's——"

"I'll let you in," the doctor said, and disappeared.

When they were together, Sim told him. The doctor made no comment, but his manner did. "Come into the office while I get a thing or two."

Sim watched him at his shelves, then spoke. "Do you think from what I've told you that it is—smallpox?"

The doctor said: "From what you've told me I should say there isn't a doubt about it."

Sim smote his right fist three times softly and very slowly into his other palm, "God, God!"

The doctor, ready now, observed the slow, expressive action, almost could hear the silent invocation. "Bit of a tragedy," he said sympathetically.

Sim said: "It is the whole of a tragedy—an unspeakable one."

As they walked he asked, hesitatingly, fearing the answer: "Does—it mark much—always?"

"Oh, not necessarily, not necessarily always. It's been only a mild type down here you know. I've seen cases where there scarcely a— She's been vaccinated, of course?"

Clearly Sim saw the radiant, lovely picture, clearly heard the radiant, laughing voice: "My dear little Sim boy, if you saw me in one of my evening frocks you'd know there isn't an inch——"

"I believe she hasn't been," he said.

"Um," said the doctor, and said no more.

When they were come to the house and were outside Linda's door, "Shall I come in with you?" Sim inquired.

"No reason why you shouldn't," the doctor said, "you have been with her all the time. But best wait a moment while I have a look."

He went in.

Through the closed door Sim heard the murmur of his voice, questioning, commenting. Replies he could not hear. Then silence, then the doctor's tone, then with a dreadful clearness a most dreadful cry:

"Oh, not that, not that! Oh, no, no, no, not that!"

His heart was wrung.

He went in. Her hands covered her face to shield it from the thing she had been told.

"Linda!"

"Oh, Sim, have you heard? Oh, Sim, Sim!"

He could have wept.

The doctor left to telephone from his house to the isolation hospital for the ambulance. It would be here in less than an hour. Sim stayed with Linda. He tried to talk with her. She just lay mute, arms locked upon her face.

"Pain, dear old girl? The back—that poor old head?"

Muffled beneath her hands: "How can I think of pain, Sim?"

WHEN she was gone—that sunbeam to that prison—it was not of the dreadful pain that she must suffer that he thought, not of the dreadful possibility of death; his thought was only of what she must suffer if she came out marred, for that return which was to be her happy ravishment of Andrew.

Oh, piteous! Andrew, who only loved the picture!

Sim's heart was wrung. Where, where in pity's name, could she have caught this? True, it was in the countryside, but contact was essential.

He and the Yeomans had to be quarantined in the cottage for sixteen days. Sim occupied himself the first morning going through Linda's things; and while he did so (oh, pitiable handling of her fineries and fripperies!) this with a mounting angry baffle-ment became the occupation of his mind—where had she made the contact?

Wait!

He stood upright, caught in a sudden thought. There was the day she had been going to lunch at Staverton Park, had gone to do so and, as he found when calling for her, had not. That was the day she came

"A FAITH THAT WOULD SATISFY"

Sim Paris, the hero of A. S. M. Hutchinson's momentous new novel running serially in THE DELINEATOR, found such a faith—says Sir Ernest Hodder-Williams. This great English publisher, managing director of the house of Hodder & Stoughton, Ltd., writes of this book which the reading public of the world is restlessly awaiting:

"I have just read Mr. A. S. M. Hutchinson's new novel for the third time—first in manuscript, then twice (every word of it) in proof.

"I am absolutely convinced that it is one of the most heart-searching books of the generation. I have no doubt that it will provoke intense discussion wherever books are read. It will be talked about, argued about, preached about, in all parts of the world. No one will be able to ignore this challenging and most moving story of a man who set out to find a 'faith that would satisfy' and Found Such a Faith.

Household work often is responsible for a bad burn. Keep Unguentine handy for such emergencies.

There's no needless pain or danger of infection if Unguentine is immediately applied whenever the children get hurt.

For blisters, cuts and all such injuries Unguentine gives thorough antiseptic treatment and brings quickest possible healing.

It has brought instant relief to more than 30 million burned and scalded men, women and children

Unguentine quickly banishes the pain of scalds and burns.

¶ Now with this famous remedy you can give the same remarkable treatment to burns and other skin injuries that famous surgeons everywhere are using

WHAT family is without them—those countless painful accidents! And worst of all are—burns! For burns not only injure but actually destroy the skin tissues and often part of the flesh itself beneath.

Today medical science has developed a remedy that gives almost instant relief!

It is used by thousands of hospitals throughout the country—and by physicians and surgeons everywhere. It has already prevented infinite suffering—saved hundreds of lives!

This remedy is Unguentine.

Unguentine is not simply a salve or ointment. It is a surgical dressing whose remarkable effectiveness has been proved even in the most terrible of burns and scalds.

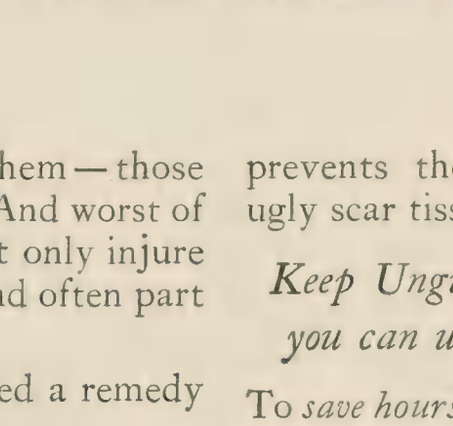
Prevents infection

Unguentine not only stops the pain of burns, cuts, blisters and similar injuries—it also prevents infection—the danger we are coming more and more to dread—even in minor accidents.

Furthermore, it keeps the wound free from germ life during the entire healing process. It stimulates the quick healing of the tissues and often prevents the formation of ugly scar tissue.

Keep Unguentine where you can use it quickly

To save hours of pain, burns, or skin injuries of any sort should be treated quickly. To prevent infection the wound should be immediately disinfected. Unguentine does both.



Simply spread it over the injured part, and bandage lightly if necessary.

Its effect, even in serious cases, seems almost miraculous. Relief begins so soon. In smaller injuries the pain in a short time is completely forgotten!

There is nothing like Unguentine made today. No medicine cabinet should be without it. 50 cents at your druggist's. Or the coupon at the right will bring you a trial tube free of all charge.

in not till late for tea and dripping wet—yes, and had sat in her wet clothes, refusing to change till she had fed; yes, and had shivered and not till then gone off to change; yes, and had told of taking shelter, when already wet, in some cottage somewhere. It must have been just about a fortnight ago.

"About a fortnight ago?" What rung familiar in that phrase? Who was it had used those words to him just recently?

He remembered.

It was yesterday—it was Sir Toridd Lesson.

His hand on the corner of Linda's writing-desk at which he was standing began to tense.

Lesson! Lesson had been at Linda's house that very day when she had told him of her debts; had been the very name Linda had mentioned immediately after she had told him she had ways of raising the money she must have. "Out Shifney way," Linda had admitted her tramp had taken her. Was it that, building on the happiness of her reunion with Andrew, she had built up also into her scheme the plan of ridding herself of those debts whose discovery inevitably would shatter the new-found happiness? With whose purse but by Lesson's?

Sim's teeth were clenched. Then, suddenly, among Linda's scattered papers which he had set himself to sort, like a flash he saw the hateful name—and without smallest scruple read the unfolded letter bearing the signature:

DEAR MRS. PARIS:
I hope you got back safely and before that rain came on. Immediately I was back here I looked into things and I write this line just to tell you that the position is as I assured you it should be. I can let you have the money—in notes—directly you get back to town. Remember, please, that you will be under no obligations to me in the matter. If when that business I mentioned to you comes up you can give me an idea about it I shall regard the money merely as a—very good investment! If not—a good investment on some "future!"

Sincerely yours,
TORIDD LESSON.

"Only let me get my fingers to him!" was Sim's cry. He tore the letter with a fury into particles as if it had been the writer's form between his hands and turned and left the room.

HE DESCENDED the stairs that led down to the sitting-room and he came into it and he saw him.

The outer door stood open. The letter's writer stood beside the door.

Sir Toridd hailed, beamed, entered.

Sim at the foot of the stairway stood as a pillar stands.

Sir Toridd, breeched, spurred, topbooted, and looking all the bulkier for the dress, had ridden over. He had a heavy hunting-crop in his hand and with it genially again saluted. "Hello, Paris, I've just come over. Linda Paris about?"

Sim said: "My sister-in-law is not"—to the extent only of those four words he controlled himself. Then came the thought, "This is the man responsible!" and a rush of passion hurled him from his balance.

"Who in hell"—it came from him like flame—"who in hell are you Linda-ing?"

Sir Toridd stood like a man amazed.

"Paris!" he exclaimed. "Man alive, are you drunk?"

Sim came two steps forward, his hands clenched.

"You hear the question? Who are you calling Linda?"

Sir Toridd paled a shade. "I thought you were drunk. I heard the question, yes, a bit more politely this time."

"Answer it, damn you!"

Sir Toridd put his right hand to the end of his crop. "By God, Paris, I don't take that talk from any man, drunk or not. What is the matter with you?"

Sim's rigid, strangled voice: "I'll tell you—it's this. My sister-in-law is not here. She's been taken away. She's got smallpox."

Sir Toridd started. "Smallpox!"

With a ring came the voice. "Smallpox. You are in a smallpox house. We are in quarantine here. Are you frightened?"

The man was not frightened. "If that's the case," he said, "if really she's got smallpox, I'm sorry. It's dreadful news. How did she get it?"

Sim came nearer. "By God, she got it through you."

Sir Toridd changed his note. His knuckles whitened on the fist that held the crop. "Paris, don't you let your madness go too far. Got it through me—what the devil are you talking about?"

"A fortnight ago, the day you came to Shifney, you made an appointment to meet my brother's wife."

He blanched a trifle, that large man realizing that this insolent young dog had knowledge that it was to buy the brother's mind that he had met the wife. He said: "We lunched for an hour together at the Trust House. She caught nothing there."

"She sheltered in a cottage coming home—that's where she caught it."

Sir Toridd gave an exclamation. "Paris, I tell you I'm sorry. But does that give me the blame?"

"It gives you what is coming to you."

The hate and rage in Sim, bursting to be free, caused him to make a threatening gesture. "It gives you what is coming to you," he cried again. "Lesson you call yourself. I've a lesson for you, damn you. Take what's coming to you—that!"

Sir Toridd raised his crop as Sim's hand came. The open palm slapped stinging on his cheek. He swung the heavy butt and crashed it.

Sim's right arm fended off the crop's hard smash—his left crashed home on Lesson's face. Sir Toridd sprang away. The crop was up and down again and only half averted, crashed and drew blood upon Sim's tawny head. A flush hit came to Lesson's mouth, reeling him back, cutting his lips and smashing a tooth in. The crop went from his hand. He spun back to a chair and crashing on it threw it over and went his length. He was up, maddened and murderous; he was down, stunningly down, unstomached, and stayed down.

Then he got up very slowly.

Sim, looking straight upon him, had a glad, exultant picture of poor and lovely Linda in his mind.

Sir Toridd collected his cap, his crop, his senses. He went to the door. "By God, Paris, I'll kill you for this," he said.

"I'll take care not to stand with my back toward you," Sim said.

But when he was left he stood a moment, swaying a little upon his feet, and dropped heavily into a chair and put his elbows on his knees, his hands upon his bruised face, and sat there heavy with his thoughts.

Linda in crisis and with what before her?—Andrew to tell—himself for sixteen days in quarantine here. Charles?—his instinct that all was not well with Charles. Elizabeth?—there with Miss Andiron now dying. Himself?—himself—his certain feeling that his Purpose now was close upon him and all ending here— What now?

CHARLES was packing!

The statement is purposely written thus because in a line by itself and with an exclamation-point to itself it has a rather perky air, and that was the air—extraordinary, almost grotesque on the care-worn, fretful face of Charles—with which he first announced to Alice the project that, when established, would bring packing in its train.

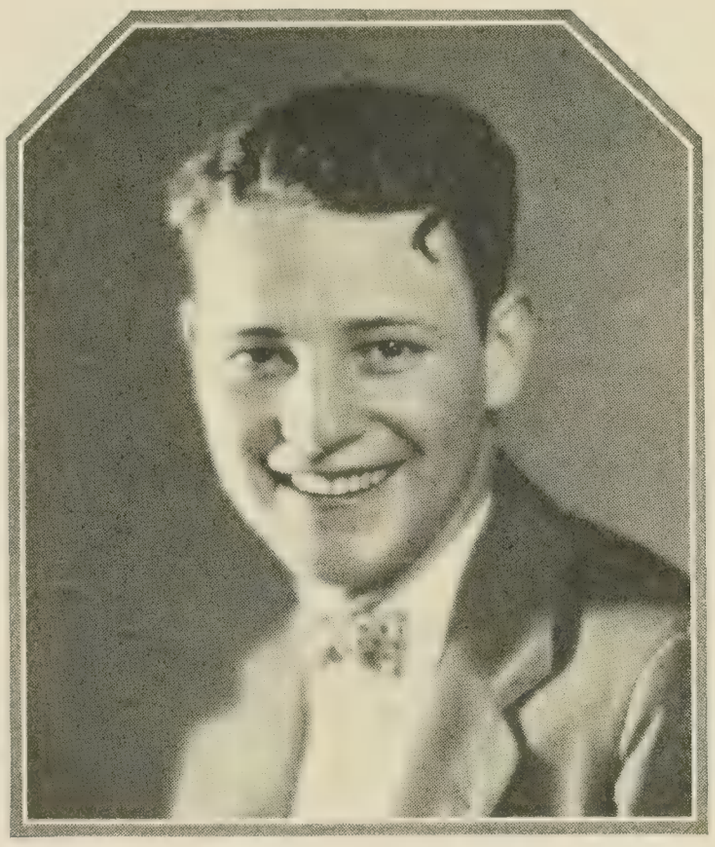
"Do you know what I am going to do with that five hundred pounds of old Gand's left after Jule has his thousand?"

This was about a week after Sim's departure from that visit for the funeral in which he had noticed at the reading of the will the sudden absorbed air of Charles when the small legacy announced.

Alice now saw this expression, too—a quite amazing alteration of Charles's face—sunshine and mischief, twenty years younger, a youth again.

"Do you know what I am going to do with it?"

She stared at him.



"No, Charles, what?"

He grinned. "I'm going to buy a country cottage!"

That was Charles when the thing was in prospect. It now was here in fact. He had found at last and bought the cottage. It was for departure on a first visit to it that he now was packing.

Yes, Charles literally was packing to be

Maybe your teeth are gloriously clear, simply clouded with a film coat. Make this remarkable test and find out.

Gleaming, Glorious Teeth

Gums like coral to contrast them

Do you seriously seek the charm they bring? Then please accept this remarkable dental test. See the marked difference 10 days will make. It's simply a stubborn film on your teeth which ordinary ways fail to remove, and which this NEW way overcomes safely—scientifically.

DULL teeth, "off-color" teeth; gums that are softening, lacking firmness—modern science has made important, new discoveries in overcoming them.

Now, in as little as ten days, you can work a transformation in your mouth, can add immeasurably to your appearance and attractiveness.

This offers you a test without charge . . . the most remarkable, according to dental authorities, of all dental tests. In fairness to yourself, send the coupon.

FILM—your enemy. How it invites tooth and gum troubles

Dental science now traces scores of tooth and gum troubles, directly or indirectly, to a germ-laden film that forms on your teeth.

You can't see it with your eyes, but run your tongue across your teeth and you will feel it . . . a slippery, viscous coating.

That film absorbs discolorations from food, smoking, etc. And that is why your teeth look "off color" and dingy.

It clings to teeth, gets into crevices and stays. It lays your gums open to bacterial attack. Germs by the millions breed in it. And they, with tartar, are a chief cause of pyorrhea and decay.

You can't have pretty teeth, unless you combat it. Highest authorities all tell you this.

Brushing won't end it

Ordinary dentifrices and cleansing won't fight film successfully. Feel for it now with your tongue. Note how your present cleansing method is failing in its duty.

Now new methods are being used. A dentifrice called Pepsodent—different in formula, action and effect from any other known.

Largely on dental advice the world has turned to it. Tooth and gum troubles hence are on the decline.

It removes that film. And Firms the Gums

It accomplishes two important things at once: Removes that film, then firms the gums. No harsh grit, judged dangerous to enamel.

A few days' use will prove its power beyond all doubt. Why cling to old methods when world's authorities urge a better way?

Send the coupon. Clip it now before you forget.

off into the world that he had never known—of freedom, of peace, of restful and silent places—the world whose four good walls were walls of the cottage of his dreams—whose surroundings were tranquil, open, spreading, hilled, wooded, meadowed, by-pathed, green-laned countryside.

The adjectives are his. His mind teemed with them, piling them one on the other until his senses, hypnotized, would swim.

He frequently would crash then.

In the midst of his giddy trance of expectation, like a drunken man suddenly shocked into sobriety, he would come to earth, realize that the thing had not yet happened; that he was not a fit man such as he visioned footing it tirelessly among those peaceful, lovely places, but a gone-soft and nerve-wracked man, trembling here (for no conceivable reason) where still he stood. He would be filled to the brim with ardent exaltation of spirit and suddenly the whole thing would pour away out of him and he be left drained as by a severed artery.

To a dispassionate observer cause for alarm might have appeared in symptoms such as these—in these setbacks, sudden and devastating from highest pitch to lowest depth. But none dispassionate was there to see them. Charles himself was in no way alarmed. Alice, accustomed to see him nervous and dejected, found only his periods of high elation strange, and at these had concern solely in remorse at the way in which he turned to her (frantic with thoughts of her approaching elopement with Conrad Bryne) to share and help his plans.

These plans of his gave her new remorse at the wrong done him by the lie told to secure Swiss Jule's silence, and gave new impetus to the final step of leaving her husband. Daily he would be finding in the advertisements of his newspaper the cottage of his dreams. He would write for particulars; he would be convinced that this was the very cottage for him; he would plan it out to her by the hour; draw plans from the description given and show them to her; search out the situation on the map and pore over the surrounding district and ecstatically describe it to her; feverishly wait upon the past and at last receive the answer and with fingers that shook open it before her—and always the price was much beyond him, always, by some malignant fate, it was in the region of that precise sum of fifteen hundred pounds which would have been his but for the vile dishonor of her lie to save herself.

She would watch his face, ashine and atremble with excitement, as, opening the letter, eagerly his eyes devoured the entrancing details of the cottage, eagerly his voice in thrilled half-sentences delivered them to her: "It's got a sun-dial on the lawn—It's sixteenth century— It's one of those half-timbered, black and white ones— It's got a little orchard and a south wall with fruit trees—" and then she would see his face cloud, twist, disfigure; moisture come to his eyes; weariness, catch and break in his voice: "It's no good. It's twelve hundred."

"Oh! Oh, Alice, cruel—sixteen-fifty he wants for it— It's no good. Too much again. 'Fifteen hundred for immediate sale.'"

Through her heart a sword would go.

HOW wait and suffer this? She must leave him quickly. Worse even were the days when, almost crazy over some cottage seen in the morning paper, "very moderate," "sacrifice for quick offer," and situated admirably for surroundings and easy access, nothing would rest him but he must dash off there and then "and secure it." It never was "and see it"; it always was "and secure it"; and certain, all his disappointments notwithstanding, that secure it he would, away from an untouched breakfast he would go, wild with excitement, so eagerly sharing with her in these days as even to snatch a kiss before he left, turning and waving from the gate, a thing not done since first they married; and always, left alone, she knew how it would be, and always it was so—return at night fagged utterly out, down to the very crypt of disappointment and depression, dropping into a chair and sitting there all the evening staringly heavily before him. "It was wonderful. It was just a dream. Oh, my God, Alice, when I first saw it I just could have gone down on my knees and worshiped it. Fifteen hundred."

Like a sword!

He never in all that time, not in the blackest of these despondencies, uttered the word of a sentiment approaching to any thought of not doing his duty, or of by any degree paring down his duty in the matter of the thousand pounds to be paid when probate was declared to Jule. For this his lifetime's dream he had available no resources other than his legacy and he regarded his legacy as the fixed, flat sum of five hundred pounds, capable of expansion by not a penny.

"Oh, Alice, when I saw it, my heart just leaped right out to it. Fourteen-fifty."

Why wait? Always, since the very beginning, she had been driven as by whips to this fate which (still she told herself) "had come upon her." Now as by scorpions she was driven. Why wait?

A DAY came bringing her relief, for which, when Charles burst the news upon her, she could have gone (and that night did go) upon her knees and thanked God. In the morning he had dashed off after one of his advertisement-column discoveries; in the evening he returned beside himself with transports. He had found it! Ideal! Within his means! Five hundred!

Relief unspeakable to her; but now upon her from a new quarter new swords, new thrusts, new pains. Hitherto her sufferings had been in his disappointments, and she the cause of them; now they were in his triumphs, in his plans and preparations with the question, coming to her at every turn, "God, am I going to leave him, Charles, my husband—I?"

He was uncommonly glad now that he had not been able to buy any of the other cottages he had seen. This that miraculously he had secured had a feature, expressed in a phrase of the advertiser's, which, had he taken one of the others and then heard of it, would have filled him, he declared, with regret and longing and dissatisfaction. The advertisement had opened with it: "In a Fold of the Downs. Artist's Cottage"—and from the very moment of his eye lighting upon the words they had sprung in his mind with the roots and with the strength of a climbing plant. "In a fold of the downs." It was the articulate and visible expression of all the yearnings for peace, solitude, tranquillity which all his life he had been able to utter and to imagine only vaguely, in a dream, in a cloud. "In a fold of the downs." He would go about the house repeating it to himself. On any book or paper in his hand he would sketch it; at dinner he would mash up his potatoes and plan out with his knife the fold in which actually the cottage stood.

She could have laughed—but she could have wept.

It was in Sussex, on the South Downs. It was six miles from the railway station. It stood with hillside before and all about you as you stood in the doorway, absolutely alone, not another habitation anywhere near it.

Hearing this the first, and then perhaps the hundredth, time, "Won't it be lonely?" she said.

"Ah! Lonely! Don't you understand that loneliness is the very thing about it that I want? Don't you realize that to be right alone where there isn't another soul or sound or sight except just space and solitude is the one thing I want? Don't you understand that? Surely to goodness you realize that by now!"

Irritation such as this, amounting often to savage exasperation, was symptomatic of the state of mind which alternated with his raptures.

IF ONE obsession of Charles's mind in these days was "in a fold of the downs," another, equally rooted, equally raging, was that something would interfere to stop him, to wreck the transaction or his enjoyment of it. The owner would change his mind; the executors would find that he was not entitled to the legacy, or that the legacy was not forthcoming from the estate; the cottage would be burned down—all manner of the most absurd fancies filled his mind.

To what degree he carried this fear was

How this easier way of cleaning helps to keep your family well

A new discovery on the habits of germs and what it teaches about family health

THOUSANDS of women all over the country are adopting this new way of easier, better cleaning. Not satisfied with what mere soap-and-water can do, they add to all their cleaning water a few magic drops of "Lysol" Disinfectant. These wonderful drops make housework easier, and make it a hundred times more sure.

Germs—those tiny invisible menaces we once so feared because we could not know where they were—science now tells us have a definite resting place. They do not linger very long in the air; they settle on all surfaces. Microscopic examination would reveal them on the door-knobs, on chair arms, on banisters and tables, hiding in the nap of rugs, and in the cracks and crevices along the floor.

Germs a constant danger to your family

THESE germs are a constant danger to your family. They seize upon moments of physical weakness or fatigue to enter the human system. In order to protect your family's health all the time, you must keep your home germ-free. It can now be accomplished in a very easy way.

Soap-and-water alone are powerless to destroy germs. They can provide merely surface cleanliness for your home. But simply adding a few drops of "Lysol" to the water, makes cleaning easier and purifies your home of germs.

"Microscopic examination would reveal germs in your home . . . . hiding in the nap of rugs, in the cracks along the floors, on chair arms, on the door-knobs, on banisters and tables . . . Here they are a constant source of danger to your family."

Easy to purify your home with "Lysol"

"LYSOL'S" soapy nature is the greatest help in keeping things shining and clean. You should use it regularly because of its three invaluable properties:

1. It deodorizes—your home is fresh and sweet, free from staleness.
2. It purifies—the health of your family is protected against germs.
3. It helps to clean as it disinfects.

"LYSOL" is three times as powerful as carbolic acid, yet so skilfully blended that it makes a solution less irritating than fine toilet soap. It will not hurt the most sensitive hands.

Cleaning with its added help is very easy. Simply put the magic drops (a tablespoon to a quart of water) into your cleaning water every time you clean. Then dip your broom, your mop, or your dust cloth into this solution, and perform your work in the ordinary way.

You will be surprised to find how "Lysol" helps in cleaning white woodwork. Finger-spots vanish like lightning, white tiles sparkle, plumbing shines. And every spot this cleansing solution touches is left pure and safe, to protect the health of your family.

If you have never used "Lysol" for general house cleaning, buy a bottle of your druggist today. It comes in three sizes, 3, 7 and the economical 16-ounce bottle. Manufactured only by LYSOL, INC., 635 Greenwich Street, New York City. Sole Distributors: LEHN & FINK, INC., New York. Canadian Agents: Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Ltd., 10 McCaul St., Toronto.

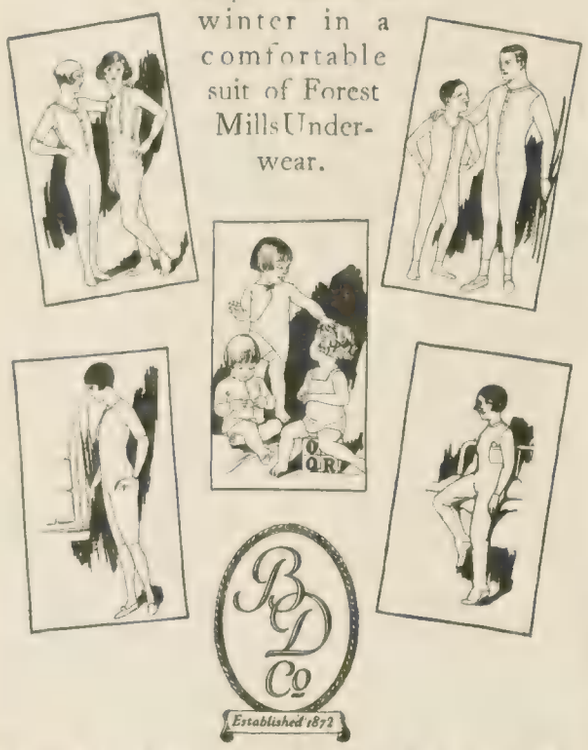
To Avoid Colds This Winter

Do as your Doctor says—

Keep your body warm. No matter what outer clothing you wear, it is essential that you wear warm, well fitting underwear—underwear that will not only absorb perspiration, but will keep your body from being chilled.



It is no longer necessary to shiver through the long winter months in order to be stylishly dressed.

Styles have changed in underwear as well as in outer wear, and today, underwear is made to conform to the styles of the outer garments.

Forest Mills
UNDERWEAR

FOREST MILLS UNDERWEAR is made to meet every requirement in a wide variety of styles and weights. The popular sleeveless style with the built-up shoulders or the bodice top with the narrow tape shoulders, insures a neat tailored appearance and yet gives warmth and comfort. For those who desire additional warmth there is the long or short sleeves, with the knee or ankle length.

Every member of the family can keep warm this winter in a comfortable suit of Forest Mills Underwear.

illustrated by his reception of the news, telephoned by Andrew, that Linda had taken smallpox. Alice, too beset by her own concerns to feel quite all that she might have felt, yet was sympathetic, shocked. Charles would discuss with her no aspect of that side of the case. The aspect to which his mind immediately sprung was that this was going to imperil his first week-end at his cottage.

"Smallpox! The one disease on the face of the earth, the absolute only disease that ever happens in England that could get in my way at a moment like this! It is unbelievable. Who could have dreamt of such a thing? There's a fate on me!"

She was dismayed at him. "Charles, how can poor Linda possibly stop you?"

He threw up his arms, exasperated. "How can it? How can't it? It is certain to. Don't you see? You don't seem to see anything. They hunt down these cases like tigers—these health authorities do. Any one anyway connected with a case is hunted down, quarantined, shoved somewhere. That is what is going to happen to me—I know it!"

"Charles, how can you possibly be connected with it, hundreds of miles away?"

"Well, see that we aren't, see that we aren't! If a letter comes from Sim, if he in quarantine is mad fool enough to write a letter to tell us all about it (just the insane, mad-headed thing he is likely to do), it is not to be opened—you perfectly understand that? It is not to be opened. It is to be burned at once, the very instant it comes into the place. And this isn't to be talked about, not to a soul, mind—not a soul is to know."

"Charles, of course——"

But he was gone from the room. "Of all the incredible, of all the unlikely—there's a fate on me—" and he was gone.

BUT the fortnight safely sped. Nothing happened. In the last few days his forebodings alike of smallpox and of every other possible contingency fell away from him—he now was only in ecstasy of anticipation, in thrill of preparation, packing. He was buying the cottage unfurnished, but it suited the owner to leave all his belongings there for a month from the date of Charles's occupancy and this Charles had agreed to. He talked a great deal about the furniture. Every piece of it had been selected by the owner, an artist, to be in keeping with the lovely old-fashioned place it filled, and Charles would stare about at the "hideous Victorian monstrosities" (as he called them) of their own house and declare that nothing here but would outrage and ruin the cottage if taken down. What he would do when the perfect stuff now there was removed he could not imagine. He would rather camp out in the place empty than desecrate it with "abortions" from here or with gimcrack imitation stuff such as he could afford to buy. It was remarkable, and it was newly distressing to Alice, that now, in these gloomy speculations, he did for the first time mention and pathetically regret the thousand pounds which must be paid to Jule.

"That thousand," he would say, "I am always thinking of that thousand now. By Jove, it does seem hard luck——"

He never actively complained, he never suggested trying to avoid his duty. That was the pathos of it to Alice. More and more she felt she could not wait—but must elope with Conrad quickly.

"That thousand," he would say, "I've been working it out. It does seem rather bad luck. The chap will sell the whole of his furniture and fittings just as they stand, and you know they are just part of the place, as much part of it as is the fold of the downs it is tucked into, for three hundred pounds. I could do that with the thousand. And then I've thought a car—I could get a car and I could pretty well live there, run in and out to the station every day— Oh, imagine it—by Jove, it is hard, it is a bit hard——"

Why wait?

The last days came. He was always coming in now with special purchases for his trip. Over them and over his schoolboy glee in them she could have wept. ("God, am I going to run away from him, from Charles, my husband?")

One day it was a suitcase. "I've nothing but that appalling old Gladstone bag, you know. No one uses a Gladstone nowadays. Do you know, though, it's not remarkable that that is all I have got. I believe I haven't had a holiday pretty well since Gladstone died. Think of that! But look at my new one. Alice—isn't it a beauty? Will I get everything in, do you think? Come and help me to try now, just a practise packing!"

Another day it was a belt. "Must wear a belt down in the country. Everybody does. Do you know, I believe I've never worn a belt since I was at school? Watch me stick it on. Just hold up my coat at the back."

And on another: "Alice, Alice, come here—just come here and see what I have got!" It was a brown-paper parcel at which excitedly he was fumbling. "Just look—imagine this for me—there—look! Took my shoes, you see, and had special thick soles put on them and these absolutely clinking golf nails shoved in! Aren't they fine! Absolutely must have nails for ranging about on the downs, you know. I'll shove them on, I absolutely must, and try them out in the garden. Come on out with me and see. Alice, do you know it is absolutely the first time in my life I have ever worn spikes! Come on out with me and see me in them."

"I will come in a moment."

She hardly could speak. She had somehow to get from him to wipe her eyes, to steady herself. "In one moment I will come."

Why wait? How—how wait, with tortures such as these?

IT WAS the last night. The suitcase was packed, every bit of it with her own hands, he fussing gleefully about her—every bit of it a stab in her heart—she would go when he was gone, her mind was made up now to that.

It was the last hours. He talked unceasingly, waiting no response.

"And over the chimneypiece in the sitting-room are—whatever do you think—pike-rests. Imagine it! Not gun-rests—they are too far apart for that. The chap says there is not the slightest doubt that the people who lived there in Elizabethan times when the place was built kept their pikes there—pikes, you know, a sort of spear. And the doorway is made very narrow so that only one man could come in at a time, and a pike just the thing of course to keep an enemy out with. Imagine it! Imagine me—me—living in a place like that and touching the things those Elizabethan people touched!"

Lucky he did not wait responses from her. She could not respond. Her heart, her throat, were charged to point of pain.

"The chap says—now just imagine this—that when he first got the place and was pulling it about to restore it (it was practically in ruins, you know), down in a crack in one of the window-frames he found an Elizabethan shilling! Just imagine that where I'm going to stand some one four hundred years ago stood and dropped a shilling and perhaps got a knife and tried to wangle it out and couldn't and left it there—for me! It's in the house now. By Jove, I shall just stand by that window and think of it. Wonderful, eh? And me, me there, the place mine! Can you believe it? Wonderful, eh?"

She affects: "Charles, wonderful!"

"The chap says I ought to try to pick up an old flintlock gun or two and wangle those pike-rests to carry them. He says they would look fine. He's had a peg put nearer in to one of the pike-rests where he kept his own gun, a modern one. He potted rabbits with it. He's taking it with him. I wish he wouldn't. But he's got an old horse pistol, too, that he used for scaring birds, and he's leaving that and says I can have pots with it if I like. I shall, too, you bet."

Her murmur: "Ah, be careful, Charles."

"The chap says— The chap says— "He is at it all the evening. He wakes in the night and calls to her and tells her more.

It is the last morning. The cab has come for him. He is crazy with excitement. He kisses her jovially, affectionately. She goes to the gate with him. He kisses her again. Will she faint while he holds her thus? His hat falls off and actually he dives for it. He is in, that wonderful new suitcase by his side, his arm upon it. He leans from the window and waves to her—has off his hat and waves, waves, waves it.

He is gone.

A New Solution of the "bad breath" problem that millions are adopting

—now carry a sweet breath with you wherever you go

HERE is a new way to breath sweetness, to quick protection against a grave social offense.

May Breath is an antiseptic mouth wash in tablet form. Dissolve one in your mouth—that is all. Instantly your breath is purified, made fresh and sweet as the Maytime.

Not a perfume to cry out an effort at concealment; but a newly found scientific method that millions are adopting.

It combats all odors, whether coming from the mouth or stomach, from any cause whatever.

May Breath comes in thin metal boxes that fit into one's purse or a pocket. You have them with you always.

That is most important. Many offend with bad breath simply because corrective measures are not handy. One never knows when a sweet breath will be needed—urgently.

Bad breath comes from so many sources that scarcely one person in fifty avoids thus offending.

Food particles between the teeth can cause it. Smoking is a constant offender. Stomach disorders are an other. Certain foods and drinks are chief causes.

May Breath offers true protection in the simplest manner known.

Never risk close contact with others, never go to a theatre or pay a social call without taking the precaution of a May Breath tablet.

First—Artistry in Silk

then the vividness of Paris Colors

NOTHING has done so much to accentuate beautiful gowns as the present color mode in hosiery. No wonder Paris is depending more and more upon its tones to complete the color scheme!

But in this profusion of color it has been too easy to center madame's attention on the shade and hasten her inspection of the fabric.

The flawless texture of filmy silks gives to Holeproof the style atmosphere which exquisite hosiery must have. No shadows, no uneven threads or knots can escape detection in our process of inspection.

Shall we forward September's Paris fashion letter to you?

Another letter from our Paris observer has just arrived. It is full of last minute news about what women are wearing over there. Also several surprises you'll like to know. There is no charge. Where shall we send your copy?

In Holeproof, as in no other hose, fine weaving means those extra weeks of wear. And perfect fit . . . so trim that there is not the tiniest wrinkle to disappoint milady on correct and fashionable appearance. These are the things that must be sought even before color is considered.

And today, you will find Holeproof showing the newest Paris shades, discovered by our observer and sent to us with utmost haste from exclusive shops along the Rue de la Paix.

All are fashionably correct. You may see them in any fabric you prefer, sheerest chiffons or heavier silks. In every style, both full-fashioned and semi-fashioned. See them at the shop of your nearest Holeproof dealer.

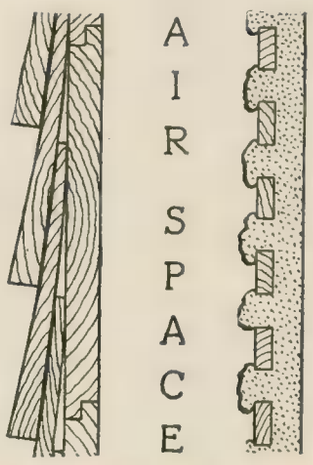
THE SEVEN IMPORTANT POINTS IN ESMOND BLANKETS

Esmond Blankets are: 1st—CLEAN—clean when you buy them, clean when you wash them because they are made of selected curly cotton. 2nd—They are warm because of the Esmond process of manufacture —2-in-1—double thickness but single length—two walls with an air space.



3rd—Esmond Blankets are beautiful. They are made in unusual patterns and color combinations. Designs and color schemes fit any room. 4th—They will withstand long and hard wear because they are "2-in-1," double weave and of the finest selected curly cotton. 5th—They are moth-proof. 6th—They are fade-proof and 7th—they are economical, being priced from $4 to $7 for you and from $1 to $4 for baby. Think that over, buy Esmonds and sleep under clean blankets. Made in America.

CLARENCE WHITMAN & SONS, INC., SELLING AGENTS, NEW YORK CITY

Through the centuries it has been proven that the double walled house is the only warm house—that an air space is necessary between the outer wall and the inner wall to retain the warmth in the house and keep the cold out. All good houses are insulated with an air space between the outer and inner walls. This is also the Esmond process of Blanket manufacture.

Send 10c for Esmond Doll Blanket. It will please your children and show what Esmond Quality is. The story of Bunny Esmond for children, free on request.

Esmond Blankets are woven two-in-one —two walls with an air space between.

Esmond Blankets are single blankets with the warmth of a pair. In the Esmond process, only one side of the yarn is fuzzed which makes the Esmond stronger, besides warmer, than a blanket made in the ordinary way with only one strand fuzzed on both sides. All Esmond Blankets have the air space between—it is the Esmond process.

His reply came the following morning:

"Run along now Honey-bud and be a good child and do not try to threaten your father, who has no fear. Felix Honeywell."

Bud shredded the yellow half-page to bits, stamped on the bits, and went out to a barber-shop and had her long, intensely brown hair bobbed.

She left Chicago three days later with excess baggage amounting to three new, well-filled trunks, a heart overflowing with accumulated rage, and a blackly wicked determination.

"MY DEAR," said Aunt Violet Honeywell, a tall lady with a cane, a waistline and a big, brazenly unpowdered nose.

"My dear," said Aunt Lucy Honeywell, a replica of Aunt Violet, nose and all except the cane.

"Well, I'm right down pleased to meet up with you," said Bud.

"We trust," said an aunt, "that you had a pleasant and not too fatiguing journey."

"I'll tell the world," said Bud.

"Indeed," said an aunt.

"How sweet," said Bud, which is a perfectly proper flapper remark to make in Washington about anything from the President to the Potomac River. But Bud was looking at Uncle Joe, the negro coachman, in his plum-colored livery.

"He sure is grand, isn't he—ain't he?" said Bud, as she stepped into the carriage—the Honeywell sisters had not, as yet, conceded motor-cars. "I'm cuckoo about purple! I bought me an orchid party dress in little old Chi that sure is a knockout."

"And your dear father?" said an aunt hurriedly. "He is well? He will miss you sadly, we fear."

"Yes," Bud answered, "Fe has his health. No, I guess he won't miss me so much. He wants me to get married, you see. That's what I came back East for—to get married. Husband, home and children. Everything like that"

"My dear Mary-Martha," Aunt Violet leaned forward a trifle and put a tightly gloved hand on Bud's knee, "though dreams of homes and children to bless those homes are most natural, most laudable, indeed—our young girls here (I say this with no spirit of fault-finding, nor of unkind criticism) do not speak so unrestrainedly of them."

"Yes, I know," said Bud. "But you see that's what I came back East for."

"Dear child," Aunt Lucy admonished, "sweetly innocent as your frankness is to us, you must not be equally frank to others. Those girlish hopes of yours may be cherished, but must be hidden deep in your own bosom."

"A hope chest," said Bud, and giggled.

Neither of the aunts giggled.

But, a few afternoons later, during a tea which her aunts had described to her as merely a little informal affair, a major-general giggled. That is to say, he pounded the arm of his chair and roared, "Ho-ho!" and, "Ha-ha-ha!" and wiped his eyes, and reached over and patted Bud's shoulder. If it had not been at one of the Misses Honeywell's teas, people would have supposed that the major-general was really having a good time. A passing colonel turned and stopped. An admiral deserted a princess who was wearing false teeth. An ambassador, who had sneaked away for a cigaret, appeared. You have seen crowds gather where food samples are being given away? It was like that.

From behind their ancient silver teapots the Misses Honeywell beamed, and in their faces was the satisfied expression of fulfilled prediction.

A little way back, peeking over the wall of shoulders made by the ambassador and the others, stood a young captain named Gideon Beebe—smallish and tidy and bashful. Many women, meeting him for the first time, had thought, "What a beautiful baby this boy must have been!" Consequently, since he was devoid of vanity, he dwelt in bewilderment and deep confusion.

"Big?" Bud was saying when he came to the group. "The Washington Monument? Poo! The Ruby Mountains could pick their teeth with that thing any morning after breakfast."

Every one laughed except Captain Beebe, who stood unsmiling and regarded her with worried, round brown eyes.

Bud looked up and over into the brown eyes. Poor Bud! She thought, "What an adorable baby that boy must have been!"

"Not," she continued, "that they would. They are mannerly mountains." It was the first emendation she had made that afternoon. The brown eyes remained worried.

"Say, listen," she said to the major-general, "who is that brown-eyed fellow standing up back there, right straight ahead of us?"

"Ah-ha," chortled the major-general. "I suppose you mean young Captain Beebe. Ladies often—er—that is—notice his boyish beauty, as it were."

"No," said Bud. "It is because he is neat and clean and cool-looking, without any trouble."

Bud yawned widely, and closed her jaws with that odd crunching sound that yawns sometimes induce. "I'm sleepy," she said. "I wish I could take a nap."

A second's pause, and then the laughter. Bud turned to the nearest dignitary and whispered, "Say, listen. Are they laughing at me, or what?"

"Indeed they are not laughing at you," returned the dignitary softly, "but from sheer joy because of you."

"Poo!" said Bud. "I'll bet you are trying to—to—to kid me."

WHEN the last guest had taken his departure—the last guest had been Captain Beebe—Bud saw that something shining had crept into the four bland, gray eyes that belonged to her aunts and that spots of color nearly as pink as their noses had come into their cheeks.

"My dear," said Aunt Violet, "you are a success."

"Indeed," said Aunt Lucy, "it would scarcely be superlative to say that you are a triumph."

"Do you mean," faltered Bud, "that you weren't ashamed of me?"

"We are," said the aunts, "very proud of our niece."

"Though, perhaps," said Aunt Violet, with a warning glance for Aunt Lucy, "you did allow young Captain Beebe rather to monopolize your society during the last half-hour."

"However," Aunt Lucy repudiated the warning glance, "Captain Beebe is of excellent family—and, though I naturally hesitate to mention it, he has, we have understood, a suitable income, a most suitable income, to supplement the modest stipend he receives from his country."

"Captain Beebe," said Bud, "is most distasteful to me. I disliked him exceedingly. I—" she paused. "I mean," she continued, "that that guy sure didn't make any hit with me. These fast workers give me a pain. Sheik stuff. Poo!"

She turned then and ran up-stairs to her room, and looked at herself in the big mirror with the gilt frame above the marble mantel. She was wearing one of the many frocks she had chosen with infinite care in Chicago. The saleswoman had called it "a snappy little imported model." A supreme impertinence in yellow, with grace notes of scarlet, may give a clearer impression to the lay mind.

Two fat tears gathered in her blue eyes and dribbled down her cheeks. Ten minutes later she was looking for a dry handkerchief and calling herself what all sensible women call themselves when they waste good, wet tears in private. "A fool—a darn fool!"

That evening the aunts wrote a letter to Felix. Eleven days later down one wide, white page Felix was proud of Mary-Martha, congratulatory toward her, and at the bottom of the page he had the cheek to say that, as he had thought, he had known his little daughter better than she had known herself.

Bud, though she never kept letters, folded this one and put it with her gloves and went down-stairs to one of her aunts' quiet, informal dinners where she told a senator that, thanks just the same, she wouldn't give a whoop for a card to the gallery; but that if he could get her a ticket to see him and the other senators some time when they were being shipped underground on that funny little scenic railway of theirs, it sure would be the comicalest experience she would be apt to have in Washington.

"More comical," questioned Captain

furniture is luxuriously beautiful and not expensive

THE use of American Walnut in the home, both for trim and furniture, has gained a wide vogue. This is due to its many beauties and to its enduring worth.

Experience shows that it lasts for centuries. A study of heirloom pieces of antique walnut furniture proves that it stands the hardships of constant use admirably. Always the inherent beauty of the wood, with its soft natural tones, its myriad patterns and designs, and its responsiveness to craftsmanship and finish, are qualities which endear it. The housekeeper likes it because it is easy and inexpensive of upkeep.

Good walnut furniture is not expensive in first cost and its durability and resistance to wear make it economical in the final accounting.

Baby's tears are just so much burned-up energy

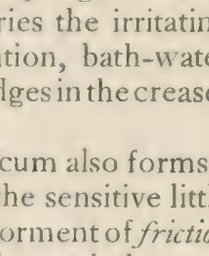
WHEN Baby cries, his precious energy goes into tears instead of growth... The little fellow's strength is sapped... Crying burns up twice his normal energy.

And Medical Science agrees that skin misery causes most of Baby's tears.

Millionsofmothershave found Mennen's the one powder best suited to the needs of Baby's tender skin....the one powder that will stop those pitiful wails of pain and put a check on wasted energy. Mennen's was the first Borated Talcum. And it has been the choice of doctors and nurses for over half a century.

Each downy fleck of Mennen's is as thirsty as a little porous sponge. Swiftly ...ever so gently... it dries the irritating moisture—from perspiration, bath-water and wet diapers—that lodges in the creases of a baby's skin.

This soft, fragrant talcum also forms a smooth, silky film over the sensitive little body, saving it from the torment of friction—from the chafing of damp clothes and woolly blankets and baby's own chubby skin-folds.



And Mennen's is made not only mild and pure, but thoroughly healing and antiseptic as well. It's just what an infant's skin needs to guard it from infection.

After several dustings with this soothing, cooling powder, Baby will be smiling thru his tears—skin all healed and comfortable and precious energy conserved.

The Mennen Baby Book is the most useful, practical text on baby care ever written. Just mail the coupon and 25c.

Beebe, who was sitting beside her on a divan with a tiny cup filled with black coffee in his hand, "than the experience you had this morning riding in the park?"

The park that October morning had been color victorious—color clear and compelling as a bugle call. And Bud had gone daft with the beauty of it, and Captain Beebe had lost his head. But here, in the ponderous, dimly lighted drawing-room, he found it again.

"I'm sorry," he went on, "awfully sorry. I began at the wrong place. You see—I've never before asked any girl to marry me and, as you know, I bungled it all up and made an ass of myself. What I was trying to say was that I love you very dearly, Mary-Martha, as you know, and that I want you to be my wife."

"Miss Honeywell," came down a colonel's voice from above her left shoulder, "regarding that interesting fraternal order of which you were telling me, the one to which your father belongs——"

"The Ancient Order of Hoo-hoo Owls, do you mean?" questioned Bud.

"Mary-Martha?" pleaded Captain Beebe.

"Oh," said Mary-Martha pettishly, almost shrewishly, "do stop pestering me. Please go away and let me alone."

Captain Beebe, because he was humble, rose and bowed and went away, carrying carefully the tiny coffee-cup in his hand.

He stayed away. There were other flowers, other bonbons, other callers. But it so happened that there was only one Captain Beebe. His absence left a hole in things.

AT THE beginning of the new week Bud suddenly produced an object, blond and tall and Greek-godish, to fill the hole that Captain Beebe had left.

Until he appeared in the drawing-room one afternoon neither of the aunts had been aware of his existence in Washington or in the world. After Bud had presented him to them they seemed even less aware of his existence than they had been before.

"Who, pray," said an aunt, as soon as the object had departed, "is that creature, Mary-Martha?"

"His name is Mr. Vernon Povill. It seems so cozy to have a mere mister around, don't you think?"

"And what is his profession? By what right is he a guest in our home?"

"He is a baker. Just now he is out of a job at baking, so he drives a truck and delivers the bread and cakes, you know. I met him down in the kitchen and invited him to call some time. He reminds me of all the wide, open places in the West. I'm going to a show with him to-morrow night."

It was, the aunts seemed to think, an impossible arrangement. They said a great deal about it and finished by asserting that they did not receive baker boys.

"Nor actresses," said Bud, and the blue eyes squinted unbecomingly. (Bud's mother had been an actress.)

A few minutes later, in her room, Bud said, "At last!" which might mean anything or nothing. In a moving-picture theater the following evening she sat in the dark beside Vernon Povill.

The weeks following after that were horrid in the extreme. Bud, so the aunts said, behaved like a madcap and a wanton. At any rate, her astonishing popularity began to wane. The troglodytes may welcome into their close caves a bit of humanity as fresh and restful as a breeze off the sea—provided, of course, it blows from exactly the same sea over which the Mayflower came sailing—but a traditionless baker, blond and bulky, is a different matter.

Long night-letters, guardedly worded, but delirious in all other respects, were sent flying west by the aunts to Felix, and they disturbed not at all that peace of his.

"She is bluffing, but send her home if it seems best," was the answer to their fifth telegram, the sixty-three carefully counted and well-considered words that they had sent the evening before.

"Yes, I know," said Bud, when they told her that Felix felt that her visit should be curtailed. "Yes—I know. But what about my coming-out party—my formal day-boo, as you call it. It is only ten days away now, isn't it?"

"So many people," murmured an aunt, "are sending regrets."

"We have checked the lists," said the other aunt. "You may see for yourself."

Acrossby was unchecked; so were Arnold and Atwood. But there was a check beside Banefield, and another beside Beebe.

On her knee Bud smoothed the paper out neatly, smoothed and smoothed and smoothed it.

"When am I to leave?" Bud questioned, and smoothed the paper again.

Susie, it seemed, was packing. Harkins was attending to the ticket and drawing-room reservations. Uncle Joe would drive them to the Union Station day-after-to-morrow afternoon.

"Hardly a thing at all left for me to do," said Bud, as if she meant it, and sighed, as if she had not meant it. "Oh, well, anyway I've a date with Vernon for to-morrow night."

"WE'LL stop in Childs' for a snack," said Vernon when to-morrow night had come and had nearly gone, and the long, dreary musical comedy had released its victims.

"No," said Bud.

"Thought you said you didn't want to get home till way late to-night."

"Well, then," said Bud.

They walked rapidly under the pallid, mistily beautiful globes that half light Washington at night. At the corner they heard a man's voice that managed to be a din, all by itself, shouting numbers.

"Come on, hurry," Vernon urged, "the show at Poli's is coming out, and there'll be a crush."

"A Poli's audience coming here?" questioned Bud, as she looked past the man baking pancakes behind the plate-glass front into the glaring white-tiled place beyond.

"Sure. Everybody comes to Childs' around midnight in Washington."

It was true. Vanity-case was there, and brass knuckles—chewing-gum, and lorgnette—fountain pen, and hypodermic needle—all there, making the place as cosmopolitan as the Judgment Day will be.

"There's a guy at that other table," Vernon said to Bud, "that's been rubberin' at you ever since we came in. If he don't cut it out, I'll step over and knock his block off."

"I don't pay you," Bud reminded him, "to knock guys' blocks off."

"Say, lay off on that pay stuff, can't you? You ain't the first lady who's been willin' to pay for me escortin' her out, now and again——"

"I know, I know," said Bud wearily. "You have told me about them all, I think."

"Oh, I have, have I? Well, I'll tell the world that any bird who ever tried to get fresh with any lady friend of mine got more than he was lookin' for."

"He isn't trying to get fresh," said Bud. "He is a friend—an acquaintance of mine."

"Can that. I wasn't born yesterday. Say, if you like that guy's looks better'n mine, just say so. See?"

"You have been drinking," said Bud. "When I engaged your services, you told me, you may remember, that you never drank. Shall we go now?"

"I'll go," said Vernon, "when I'm damn good and ready to go. See? You've high-toned me as much as I'm goin' to stand for. See? Sure I had a few drinks between acts. Whatcha goin' to do about it? You make me sick, you do. Payin' me to run around with you, 'cause you can't get a guy to take you out without payin' him, and then pullin' the high and mighty line. Wha's five dollars a night and expenses? Zat worth——"

He continued. Bud scarcely heard him and did not answer. She sat and thought what a long way it was to the red brick house on N Street. Once she had shot a mad coyote at too close range; and once she had pounded flat, with a club, the head of a coiled rattlesnake, and neither time had she been afraid. But now she had no gun, and she had no club, and she was afraid.

Then they went out, leaving behind all the people and the pancakes and the bright, white light and the fresh guy who had been Captain Beebe.

She hoped Mr. Povill would not think of a taxicab—he rarely did—but she was afraid that he might think of it if she suggested a street-car. So she made no suggestion, but walked along beside his lurching steps.

They came to Lafayette Park, the winning little park that Bud had loved better, perhaps, than anything else in lovely Washington, because of the pink babies and the gray squirrels. But to-night the place was as solitary as a bad dream. Bud was afraid.

As they went from Pennsylvania Avenue into the park Vernon grasped her elbow: "Help you along," he explained. "Sorry I got rough. 'Smy heart. Got a weak heart. But any lady out with Vern Povill is as safe as in her mother's arms. Yes'ir. Safe as mother's arms."

He stopped and stood still, holding her elbow firmly. "Tha's the idea," he exclaimed. "Tha's the idea. You ain't much for looks, nor manners, but I hold no grudge. Goin' away. Should tell you good-by. Come to my safe arms——"

"Don't be so silly," commanded Bud. "Let go of my arm and come right along now——"

"You got me wrong," interrupted Vernon, "this's what I mean. You're goin' away. Clear across continent. Gotta tell you good-by. Wha's the use of a park for, tha's what I wanta know——"

AT THAT moment Captain Beebe stepped up—he had been stepping right along behind them ever since they had left the restaurant—and said: "Miss Honeywell, I might, perhaps——"

One of Vernon's huge arms swung upward and the fist landed near the tip of Captain Beebe's finely pointed chin. Captain Beebe went backward and down, quickly, quietly and flat. Vernon Povill turned and ran away.

It is a pity that it had to happen so. By all the conventions for rescuing heroes and pestering villains Captain Beebe should have knocked down Vernon Povill. But Captain Beebe had not been on his guard, nor suspicious. So he keeled over and Bud ran to him, and knelt beside him, lifted his head and shoulders in her arms, and said: "Captain Beebe! Captain Beebe!" And, when he did not answer that, she said, "Oh, my dear! My dear!" And, when he did not answer that, she was as frightened as if Lafayette Park had been the huge yawn that is the entrance to eternity and she could see the lips of life closing slowly down around it. Her hot, salty tears fell wet on his face, and she cried: "But I love you so much. I love you so much——"

"Hum-um," said Captain Beebe. "Hum-um," clearing his throat. He wagged his head against Bud's soft shoulder. He felt of his chin. "Who loves me?" questioned Captain Beebe.

"Oh—I do," said Bud. "Oh—I do!"

"Mary-Martha Honeywell," said Captain Beebe, and the way he said it made it sound a little better than a poem.

He stood up then, she brushed him off. And, as that Vernon Povill had said, "what are parks for, anyway?"

They found a taxicab.

"The trouble is—" began Bud, when they were in the taxicab, and the door was closed.

"There is no trouble," said Captain Beebe, "anywhere in the world, and there never shall be. I love you more than I know how to love you."

"—that I've been acting a part ever since I came to Washington. I was so angry because I had to come, and I was determined to be revenged, and to make them all ashamed of me, and——"

"Bad little actor," interrupted Captain Beebe.

"Me, you mean?" questioned Bud.

"You forgot your lines so often, you know," he apologized.

"Why, I did not," said Bud.

"And balled them all up, and your voice didn't match—like trying to sing jazz to one of Chopin's nocturnes."

"Well, you see," explained Bud, "I got most of my words from a Chicago garment worker on the train. And I wasn't with her very long, and so many situations arose——"

"I see," said Captain Beebe, and laughed.

"But you don't seem to see," argued Bud. "You fell in love with one sort of person, and I'm not at all that sort of person. I'm not tough, nor flip, nor rude, nor bad-mannered, nor—anything you want your wife to be. Besides, I read Greek."

"That settles it," said Captain Beebe, and laughed. "That Greek settles it," he said again, and laughed, and laughed again.

"And so," said Bud, with much dignity, "I can't possibly marry you——"

"Oh, if that's what you mean," said Captain Beebe airily, "you'll have to." He kissed her.

"But my revenge," murmured Bud. "I'll be doing just what they wanted me to, and my lovely, dastardly revenge——"

"Revenge is—" began Captain Beebe, and stopped to kiss her again.

"Sweet," said Bud.

"Sweet," agreed Captain Beebe, and they went riding on in the taxicab, a white taxicab, with a little black on it, like a wedding invitation.

PLANT YOUR SPRING GARDEN NOW

Irises too are under the ban. This means the lovely dwarf and very early iris reticulata, and pumila, and sibirica. These, however, are not such a hardship, for they may be more easily grown here than the bulbs. And the lilies we have been importing from France—they also may come no more.

Wherefore the gardener who cares for daffodils must hasten, lest she be in the same difficulty as the Foolish Virgins in the matter of the oil.

Now as to where to plant. Daffodils are charming beside a walk—brick, or flagged, or gravel. Lavender-blue hyacinths may be introduced beside them with delightful effect; just this planting and no more beside a flagged walk makes the close of St. Mark's-in-the-Bouwerie very lovely. Narcissus is very beautiful naturalized in the grass; it is an adorable companion for the crimson peach, and very beautiful planted beneath lilac bushes. Aside from the old "poeticus" and the double narcissus beloved by our grandmothers, be sure to have some of the narcissus "orange phœnix." Mrs. King uses this with the tulip couleur cardinal.

Beside paths, in front of shrubbery, sheltered by shrubs so they may bloom at their earliest convenience—there are preferred places for bulbs, and here they will be in their happiest rather than in the more usual isolated groups on the lawn. Planted in the border or at the edge of the border, naturalized under trees, the bulb in its "off season" is unnoticed, for other plants crowd past, occupying the center of the stage; hence the bulb can mature its foliage in peace, make ready for next year's blooming.

As to the "How" of planting: four times the depth of the bulb is the rule. Any good soil will serve, though sand and leaf-mold in good proportions is preferred. Bulbs dislike manure. If you are planting but a small quantity, it is safest to put about a tablespoonful of sand in the hole for the bulb to set upon. Plant tulips six inches deep and five or six inches apart; daffodils and narcissi, four or five inches deep and the same distance apart; the little bulbs—scilla, chionodoxa, crocus and the like—three inches deep.

If you are a city dweller and have no garden, plant bulbs in any tiny plot in front of the house or glorify your rooms inside with a box of gay tulips or narcissi. Mrs. Duncan has prepared a leaflet that tells you all about planting indoor bulbs and we will gladly send it to you for just a two-cent stamp to cover postage. Send your request to the Garden Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

Sh-h-h!

YOU'D think at first it was a real baby. It sleeps and cries. With its cute, flat little nose, and cunning rosebud mouth, the Bye-Lo Baby captures the heart of every little girl.

If you want to give your little girl a thrill of joy, such as no ordinary doll can give her—just put the Bye-Lo Baby in her arms and watch her cuddle it. Grace Storey Putnam, the sculptor, worked years before she caught just that perfect expression of a real three-day-old baby.

For sale at leading toy and department stores. In seven sizes from 9 to 20 inches. Despite imitations you can tell this genuine copyrighted Bye-Lo Baby Doll by the sculptor's name imprinted on the back of the head, and her signature on the identification tag. If your dealer cannot supply it, write our Dept. 16-C and we will tell you where you can get it.

A more complete food as well as a preventive for Goiter

If Mothers only knew what they could spare their children—

No other salt but Morton's Iodized would be used

DON'T make the mistake of thinking that simple goiter is something that attacks other people's children—but not your own.

Unfortunately, this malady is so common that only 2 out of 3 children escape it.

Yet it is the easiest known disease to prevent—and iodized salt is the best means of prevention.

Salt Provides Iodine That Foods Lack

Goiter is caused by the failure of everyday foods to supply the thyroid gland (in the neck) with iodine, without which it overworks and enlarges. To keep goiter from developing, it is only necessary to eat food containing enough iodine to supply the thyroid.

Tastes No Different

And health authorities have found the ideal food for this purpose is Morton's Iodized Salt—perfect table salt to which the natural iodine lost from all salt in refining has been restored.

It tastes and looks the same as our famous salt that pours.

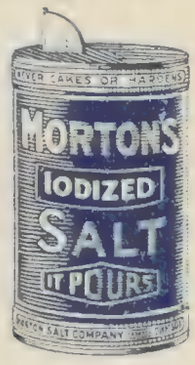
Spare Your Children Ill-Health

All over the country Morton's Iodized Salt is being used for cooking and on the table with approval of highest health authorities.



It is saving thousands from goiter—duplicating the triumph in Switzerland, where iodized salt practically eliminated goiter.

Protect your health and that of your children by using this more complete food. Get it at your grocer's today.

LITTLE TEXAS

"Mr. Fitzgerald," she said brokenly, "how wonderful it is!"

"We will go in when you are rested," he said. "If you don't mind, I would like to have my servants meet you. They have waited almost as anxiously as I for Kingsley's coming."

Mishmer followed them into the house, his toes pecking dully after them on the hardwood floors. Mr. Fitzgerald took Meg from room to room slowly, his hand beneath her arm. When they reached the kitchen, Mrs. Becker in a starchy dress and Becker in fresh linen were waiting.

"My cook and butler," Mr. Fitzgerald introduced with his usual brevity, and Meg, with that same smile that had bound Mrs. Becker to Texas in the circus, offered a hand to each of them with utter simplicity.

"I'm glad to know you," she said. "What a beautiful place you have to live in!"

It is an odd thing that to be one with the greatest you must first be able to be at home with the least. It was Meg's grace in accepting the introduction to his cook which told Mr. Fitzgerald in one second that King had married some one of whom Fitzgerald Mansion need never be ashamed.

On through the magnificent rooms to that up-stairs fairyland of white and rose where the doll, the tiny furniture, the piles of exquisite filmy clothes were waiting—where Meg cried a little, then smiled through her tears as she saw that Mr. Fitzgerald was crying a little too, and at last to the room where the steady gray eyes of King's picture looked out at it all.

Mr. Fitzgerald didn't tell Meg it was there. He opened the curtains and let her go in alone—then went to find her half an hour ater. She was sitting in his leather chair, her face against the painted canvas.

"This is King's home," he said, after he, too, had sat looking at the picture. "Texas doesn't understand that her place is here. Will you write her? Will you tell her I have done everything I can for her? Will you ask her to come to me?"

Mr. Fitzgerald rose to face Meg, his hands behind his back, Mishmer pecking at a stone in the ring on his finger.

"No, Mr. Fitzgerald," Meg answered quietly. "I will never ask Texas to come to you. I never want her to know what wonders are here for her. I never want her to see this house, or know its beauty, until she has made up her mind she wants to come because she'll be coming—to you."

Mr. Fitzgerald stood perfectly still for a minute—then he held out both hands to this girl his son had left to him.

"Meg, you're a queen," he said. "I want you very much, too. Won't you stay?"

But Meg shook her head.

"Not now," she said. "Let Texas come first."

They crossed the lawn arm in arm to where the car was waiting. On the lake a new little boat was lapping along the shore, "Texas" painted on it in gay letters.

"Oh, how lovely!" Meg breathed. "It doesn't seem true that you have done all this for my little girl."

Mr. Fitzgerald smiled as he lifted her into the car.

"But you see," he reminded her, "she is my little girl, too."

TEXAS was very happy as the late Summer days went along. Her mother Meg was getting better. Their bank account was growing for a cozy Winter somewhere—and then, this very first day of September, in Montgomery, Alabama, came along an important looking contract for the new season—at a plump raise in salary. With it was a note from Papa Saunders. It said:

MY DEAR CHILD:
We are all very proud of you, and want you, of course, in the star spot for next season. I am enclosing a contract for which we have your mother's consent, and now want just your name. Ask some one to show you where to sign it. With a fat kiss to my little Texas,

PAPA SAUNDERS.

Texas read it over and over—the letter and the really-truly contract. Such a wonderful thing! She put it deep down in her pocket with a happy little sigh. She was taking care of her mother. What a wonderful thing!

Papa Saunders's letter came to her just after dinner-time. When she had quite finished it, she took a little journey into the menagerie after Jim's monkey, who fairly burst the bars when he saw her, and the two of them went for a walk together, out along a tiny creek where they sat down on the stony bank and watched the baby fish shimmering through the shallow water, the monkey turning stones to see the crayfish wriggle away.

Texas told him all about the contract, and he twisted his cold little fingers in her hair and told her a lot in return that no doubt he considered quite as worth listening to.

The dog boy was in the creek in boots washing the brown dancing poodles. Of course it was her immediate duty to become barefoot and splash in to help him—the monkey talking swift African from her shoulder.

It was a bespattered little star who returned to the dressing-tent just as a pale moon came up over the big top. Second bugle had blown and from the pad-room out of the shadows came the spangled horses and plumed riders, the moonlight making their spears and helmets and satin like dripping silver. The camel train, hung with silken robes, padded up out of the darkness, like a vision of a desert caravan. Then the whistle blew, and the whole tournament—like a fantom thing of Cairo, India, Eden and all the ages gone—wound up out of the darkness into the light.

Texas watched it, after which, with a hop and skip, she went to get dressed for the act, reaching up to undo her buttons on the way.

Aunt Mary called her as she passed the wardrobe table. A letter had come for her—rich paper, wide masculine hand.

"I suppose it's from your wealthy grandpa," she offered. "Laws sakes, ain't it funny—all the frettin' folks waste on things that never happen! Would you mind telling me what he's got to say?"

Texas climbed up on the table and lay flat on her back under the gaslight. She drew out the scrawled pages as Aunt Mary leaned across the table, chin in hands. She read slowly:

MY DEAR GRANDDAUGHTER:
As it is September, I write to ask if you will plan to say good-by to the circus when it closes, and come to me to stay?

Texas looked up at Aunt Mary.

"Go on," that good woman said crisply. "The circus doesn't close till October last. He's speakin' up good and early!"

Your mother tells me you have planned she shall join you in the South at the close of your engagement and remain there until time for the season to open—then continue your work. I am asking you, my dear child, to change your plans, come here when your show is done, and arrange not to return. If at any time you need anything, let me know.
Your affectionate grandfather,

KINGSLEY FITZGERALD.

"Well my land, what a document!" Aunt Mary sputtered. "Who's the man think he's writin' to? There ain't another twelve-year-old kid in the world could understand that—let alone havin' the level head to answer it!"

Texas put the bulky letter back in the envelope.

"Aunt Mary, have I time to go to the doctor's tent a minute?" she asked.

There was a sudden laugh and scramble and tinkle of spangles outside the door and a sudden rush of girls coming in from the tournament. Aunt Mary brushed Texas off the long table with one sweep of her arm.

"Well, you've got to go some place mighty quick!" she said abruptly. "Here comes all my entry clothes to pack. You've got an hour and a half before your turn. That's time enough for anything."

Texas squirmed past the sparkling figures who were coming in and ran across the dewy grass to the doctor's tent. He was sitting on his little porch reading the evening paper.

"Hello there, Dumplin'," he greeted.

"Doctor Mifflin," Texas said directly, "will Mama Meg be well enough to come back to the circus next year?"

"No reason why she can't," he smiled. "She's up and around now, and the Winter months will put her right on her toes! By Spring Mama Meg can do just about anything she wants to!"

Texas tumbled joyously into the doctor's lap.

"Oh, goody, goody, goody!" she squealed.

One woman's experience suggested this contest for other women

THE EXPERIENCE of one woman who has used Premier Salad Dressing for six years suggested this competition for other women. She wrote to us, "I find Premier really different from other Salad Dressings because it has so many legitimate uses—just let me tell you the different ways I actually used one bottle of Premier Salad Dressing."

These are the ways she used it

She used Premier in a vegetable salad

She put chopped olives in Premier to serve with fillet of sole

She served Premier with artichokes at a luncheon-party

She put Premier in mashed potatoes, before she served them

She used Premier as a luscious dressing for fruit salad

She seasoned 12 deviled eggs with Premier

She put Premier on top of 4 poached eggs as Eggs Benedict

She spread Premier in 8 dainty lettuce sandwiches

Then in his big arms she grew thoughtful. After a moment she slipped to the ground and drew two envelopes from her pocket—the contract and the other one. She spread them out as children spread toys—looked at one, and the other, her head on one side, the doctor watching her. After a long time she smiled up at him and came over against his knee, holding out the envelope addressed in Papa Saunders's hand.

"Doctor Mifflin, would you show me, please, where to put my name on this paper?"

Doctor Mifflin looked down tenderly at this young, sweet, oddly wise little girl—then he spread the contract on his knee and brought his fountain pen from his pocket.

"Right on the dotted line," he told her and held his knee steady, while she carefully signed on the dotted line—"Kingsley Fitzgerald."

TEXAS laughed the next day because the show was going to Yazoo City, Mississippi. She said it over and over, and laughed every time she said it.

"It sounds like I'm sneezing, Josephine," she bubbled as they tumbled out of bed when the train finally drew them into town. "It's such fun to say it I think I'll ask mother if we can't stay here all Winter!"

The train was quite out of town—just close to the lot. Josephine, looking across the track, saw the poles up, the cook-house flag flying, canvas spread on the ground—then she suddenly realized how quiet it was. No sound of stakes pounding. Working men sitting idly on hay bales and pole wagons.

"Texas," she cried, alarm in her voice, "something's wrong! Something's happened!"

She saw performers swinging down from the steps of the cars ahead and gathering together anxiously.

Josephine and Texas hurried into their clothes and ran outside.

Nobody knew much about it—but Papa Saunders had sent word that there would be no performance, that the show was to close.

"To close!" Josephine echoed. "Why, it can't close! I haven't a cent! I sent my last dollar to my little sister last night!"

Captain Gordon came up the track swinging Miss Tiny in a basket.

"Well," he said, "is it true?"

Nobody knew, but from all sides the performers came in serious little groups. Tommy the Clown Kid came down the middle of the road from the lot with the gray goose under his arm. He joined them soberly.

"Folks," he said, "the cook-tent is up, but there isn't any breakfast. Something's happened all right!"

It was just one big family waiting to hear what Papa Saunders had to say. A thousand men and women, stars and working men bound together with brother love—and circumstance.

They listened so quietly that Mr. Saunders hardly spoke above his ordinary tone of voice.

The circus was closed! This morning the lawyer had called in behalf of the heirs of George Melbourne, who had died, to say that, since their deceased relative had been entirely alone in his attachment for and understanding of the circus, his heirs at law had decided immediately to dispose of every part of it—especially the risk and responsibility of continuing it.

"Friends," Mr. Saunders said, his voice husky, "this has come to us like a cloud in a clear sky. It is hard to believe it—when for so many years we have lived and worked together. But it has come, and there is nothing for us to do but bid each other good-by and know the future will care for us all."

As he finished, many crowded around him. Texas somehow had come to be with Joe.

"But Joe," she said wistfully, "we don't know what to do, do we? There isn't going to be any circus to-day, Joe—nor any day! I don't know how I can perform when there isn't any circus! And Mama Meg has to have money. Where will Jim's monkey go and—" in sudden alarm—"where will poor Torchy go?"

"Jim's got plenty of money," Joe said, "the monkey'll get along all right. All the folks ain't busted, Texas," and then he added thoughtfully, "but none of them can afford to sit down and stop working and us fellers that has only been doin' the common jobs, we ain't got fifty dollars among a hundred of us, I guess. It's funny how quick things happen!"

Aunt Mary bustled up behind them, her peach bonnet in her hand, a starchy shirt-waist and her Sunday gloves on.

"Laws sakes, child!" she exclaimed, giving Texas a little scolding shake. "I've been traipsing over five square miles a-huntin' you down! Didn't you promise me once if a cyclone ever struck, you'd come straight to your Aunt Mary? And if this ain't a cyclone, I never ate pancakes! Well, you ain't very clean—but get up and come along. We're going out in Yazoo City and look for a job!"

Texas hastily stood up and wriggled her frock straight.

"Oh, how nice, Aunt Mary," she exclaimed, "that we're going to have a job! What's the job going to be?"

"Heaven only knows," Mary Johnson replied, arranging her bonnet firmly, "but if we don't hurry it'll be nothing! Because inside of an hour and a quarter every job there ever was in this town is goin' to be filled and finished—from assistin' the mayor to sweepin' the streets! It ain't goin' to take Yazoo City long to find out it's been increased by one thousand population—fifteen hundred, in fact, countin' horses, lions and bears. Well, come on! Comin', Joe?"

Joe shook his head.

"No, thanks, Aunt Mary," he said. "Guess I'll start hoofin' it home to Chicago this afternoon, if you're goin' to look after the little one."

He looked up at that little one, and held out his hand.

"Texas," he said, "good-by."

Texas stared at him a minute—then simply flew into his arms, catching him like a vise.

"Why, Joe!" she sobbed, the thing coming suddenly home to her, "I forgot that everybody will have to go away themselves, Joe! And I won't have any ropes and things! Joe, I'll just have to cry and cry and cry, if there isn't any cloud-swing, Joe! Maybe I'd better hoof it with you. Maybe we'd find another circus somewhere, where I could have another cloud-swing, Joe."

"Now, young man, why didn't you keep still!" Aunt Mary sputtered. "There's trouble enough to-day without your starting up any!"

Joe patted the little shoulder and kissed the golden hair and bit his lip and looked away, to uphold his own dignity before both Aunt Mary and Texas. But it was Gipsy Jean who really straightened things out, hurrying past them.

"Come on, girls," she called back over her shoulder to a forlorn little bunch, "we're going to town and look for a job."

Texas sat up instantly and brushed her hand across her tearful face.

"Don't hoof it until we come back, Joe," she said in a shaky little voice. "Aunt Mary and I have to hurry and look for a job."

AND they did look for a job—and so did a thousand other people! By early afternoon the citizens of Yazoo City, Mississippi, were so completely supplied with cooks and waiters, with dry-goods-store clerks and children's nurse-maids that the town had much more help of all kinds than it had population who needed help. But Aunt Mary Johnson and Texas were not among the fortunate. Through a weary round of applications and refusals the two had gone from one shop to another, one house to another, till it seemed there wasn't a person in all Yazoo City they hadn't spoken to.

At five o'clock in the afternoon they met Tommy the Clown Kid in new overalls, spearing scrap papers out of the city park—the gray goose solemnly waddling after him. Aunt Mary's hat was on one side, the starch gone from her shirt-waist. Texas's dress was limp and her hair tangled gold. Tommy sauntered up to them as Aunt Mary dropped on a park bench.

"Aunt Mary, we couldn't spend just a nickel to feed the squirrels, could we?" Texas wondered.

"No, indeed!" Aunt Mary informed her emphatically. "A nickel's going to look just the size of a loaf of bread from now on!"

Tommy grinned.

A Sure Way to End Dandruff

There is one sure way that never fails to remove dandruff completely, and that is to dissolve it. Then you destroy it entirely. To do this, just apply a little Liquid Arvon at night before retiring; use enough to moisten the scalp and rub it in gently with the finger tips.

By morning, most if not all, of your dandruff will be gone, and two or three more applications will completely dissolve and entirely destroy every single sign and trace of it, no matter how much dandruff you may have.

You will find, too, that all itching of the scalp will stop instantly, and your hair will be lustrous, glossy, silky and soft, and look and feel a hundred times better.

You can get Liquid Arvon at any drug store and a four ounce bottle is all you will need. This simple remedy has never been known to fail.

"Well, Aunt Mary," he remarked, "in fifteen years I never saw you beat before!"

Aunt Mary straightened her bonnet promptly. "Beat! Who's beat!" she wanted to know. "Can't a lady rest in the town park? Now that there's such elegant help to keep it going, a customer once a day shouldn't be such a novelty!"

"Lookin' for a job?" Tommy inquired.

"No," Aunt Mary snapped, "we're lookin' for a picture show! Here, Texas, run get a dime's worth of peanuts for the squirrels and some peppermints for yourself."

Texas frolicked away with the money and when she returned Bum Casey was sitting on the bench beside Aunt Mary, Tommy leaning over, listening attentively.

"Well, Texas," Aunt Mary called as the little girl came back around the fountain with the peanuts, "hurry up with your squirrels. We've got to get back and pack up to go to Jackson."

"To Jackson!" the little girl exclaimed. "Is the circus going to Jackson?"

"One circus is," Aunt Mary announced. "The Museum of the Metropolis is going to Jackson." She turned to Bum. "There—I named it on the instant!" she said. "That sounds grand, doesn't it? How big is your tent? We'll put up a trapeze for Texas and I'll sell the tickets and——"

"Oh, are we going to have a show of our own?" Texas interrupted rapturously. "Just Bum and me and Aunt Mary and Albert?"

Tommy had been listening to all of it.

"Why don't you take Miss Tiny," he suggested. "She doesn't eat much, and the captain went to work for a furniture-mover to-day, so she's the lonesomest thing in town. She could sell picture post-cards."

"That's a bright idea," Aunt Mary agreed, "isn't it, Bum? Come on, Texas. Now, Bum, you get right along down to the cars to be fitted."

A train left that night for Jackson at eleven-thirty, just across the track from the show cars. It was a forlorn picture they left behind them—the cars with their dim lights, their lonely, disheartened occupants.

Aunt Mary didn't try to say good-by—and wisely she kept Texas from trying to say it. Bum had gone on alone with the tent and Albert the elephant—so it was just Aunt Mary and Texas in their Sunday clothes with Miss Tiny between them crying softly against the side of her basket who all alone and very quietly left the beloved circus train, crossed the tracks and boarded the half-past-eleven for Jackson. Aunt Mary with great care held beneath her arm a highly colored sign which one of the show boys had just made for her.

"The Great Museum of the Metropolis," it said, in bright green diamond-dusted letters. "Albert—the dancing, singing elephant with the intelligence of a college professor! Little Texas—the world's child marvel of the air! Miss Tiny—the smallest human being who ever lived! All for one quarter—the sum of twenty-five cents takes you in!"

Their train pulled slowly out of the station; then, at the edge of the town, it stopped.

"Held up for some elephants," the brakeman said.

Texas cupped her hands around her face against the window. Out in the darkness a procession of elephants was moving along against the night sky—huge, silent things, long swinging steps, just a faint sound down the road of the pad-pad-pad of their heavy feet. Trunk to tail, a man and a dim lantern swaying steadily on the head of each, they, too, were leaving the circus behind them.

WHEN The Great Museum of the Metropolis ended its fourth day, Aunt Mary had ninety-nine dollars in her hand-bag and the corporation was elated.

The vacant lot Bum had found was close to town and across from a schoolhouse, which caused much excitement for Texas and the scholars. The second day at recess she was timidly invited across the street and introduced to her first game of pom-pom-pullaway, introduced also to her first experience of having child playmates. At first it was with a little reserve that she joined them in romping and tagging each other, then after one day of it she began to sit by the ticket-stand of The Great Museum of the Metropolis at nine in the morning to count minutes till it was time for the recess—which was of course an advertisement for the show that money couldn't have bought. In the first four days every child in school appeared at some time or another with twenty-five cents each, collected from one to twenty relatives!

Texas longed to take Tiny to play, but Aunt Mary insisted it would be using no "business head" at all. She did, however, allow Albert to be taken across the street to the awe and admiration of the entire student body.

Bum had made a strong little trapeze for Texas—it was by no means a cloud-swing, but she was so graceful and lovely on it as to excite the interest of entire Jackson.

They commenced the show at five. The tent had a board floor and a piano—to operate which Aunt Mary had secured Julia, the young woman next door, at a salary of five tickets a night.

The entire company roomed and boarded with Julia's mother. The "entire company" meant of course the people, plus Albert, to whom, at first, there had been some objection, but who had proved himself such a peaceful occupant of the landlady's empty barn that she was rather beginning to enjoy the novel sensation of looking out of her kitchen windows upon an elephant. Albert had made himself entirely at home in the back-yard, eating bread chummily from the kitchen window-sill and washing it down at the rain-barrel.

TEXAS did not waken the fifth morning of their stay in Jackson until Julia knocked several times at her door.

"It's too bad to wake the child when she's still sleepy," she said, "but it's half-past ten, and I promised to have her up and fed by noon."

Texas was startled from sound sleep by the knock on her door, and Julia found her very warm and rumpled, sitting in the middle of the bed.

"Hello!" Julia greeted her. "You're the sleepiest kid I ever saw! Your school is out for recess already!"

"Oh is it?" Texas yawned. "I must hurry!"

"Yes, do," Julia answered. "Get dressed and come down to breakfast. Everybody's through long ago. Here, I'll do your hair."

Texas stood in her nightgown while Julia washed her face and did the curls, and then she promised to hurry—and did hurry, too, for in ten minutes Julia's mother heard the hop-hop-skipping of her feet on the stairs.

Her place was set alone at the table. It was very quiet—so quiet the ticking of the clock seemed like little sticks slapping together.

Tiny's basket was always kept on the dining-room window. It was gone.

"Has Aunt Mary taken Tiny somewhere?" the little girl asked.

Julia's mother in the kitchen went on cutting cookies.

"Eat your breakfast, like a good little girl. I'm too busy to talk," she said.

But the quiet, the emptiness of the house gave Texas a queer feeling—a sort of alarm.

Texas left her orange and went into the kitchen.

"Where is everybody, Mrs. Stedman?" she asked.

Mrs. Stedman buttoned Texas's dress and handed her a fresh cookie.

"There," she said. "Run along to the front porch and play."

The kitchen window faced the old barn. Texas suddenly saw that the door was standing open. Albert was gone.

She ran to the door. Across the fence was the lot of The Great Museum of the Metropolis. The lot was empty. Just a scar on the grass was left where it had been the day before.

Texas looked up at Mrs. Stedman helplessly—then ran through the dining-room, up the dark narrow stairs to Aunt Mary's room. It was empty. The clothes were gone. The trunk was gone. Every little thing taken from the dresser and table.

Bum's room was next and as empty as Aunt Mary's. Tiny's room next to Texas's was empty, too.

Texas stood in the hall, entirely bewildered—so frightened she couldn't think.

How I Reach The Hard-To-Get-At Places

By Mrs. Housewife

"There is never any embarrassing lint under my heavy furniture because my home-made 3-in-One Polish Mop makes the hard-to-get-at places easy. Under goes the mop; out comes the lint, clinging to it like needles to a magnet, to be shaken off out doors.

"To make my 3-in-One Polish Mop I merely cut off the strands of an ordinary twine mop about eight inches from the handle and sprinkle the remainder with 3-in-One. In a short time the oil has permeated all through the mop and it is ready to use on hardwood floors, painted or varnished floors, linoleum."

me—gone and left me," she said chokingly.

Then she heard Julia coming to her.

"Don't be scared, Lambie," the girl whispered and kissed her. "Somebody down on the front porch has been waiting for you a long while."

JULIA led her down-stairs and pushed open the front door. Mr. Fitzgerald was sitting in the porch chair—a long shining limousine and chauffeur at the door. He stood up to greet her.

"It's a lovely morning to ride, Texas," he said. "We should have started earlier."

"Why, where are we going?" she asked faintly. Everything was so strange—so puzzling.

"I have something to show you," he said.

"But nobody's here," she faltered. "Where have they gone?"

"If you want to find them," he smiled, "we'll just start out and travel till we do."

So Texas, very tiny in the far corner of the big seat of the limousine—her hands in her lap, her eyes wide and wondering—rode through miles and miles of country—by the hill roads and rivers of Mississippi, past sunny farms and sleepy cotton-fields, through little towns and past low, lovely mansions—with that tall old man who watched her so searchingly.

They stopped at a wayside vine-covered inn for lunch, where they ate on a porch at a little round table and aroused the attention and curiosity of every one—this distinguished-looking old man and the flowerlike child.

Then they rode all afternoon until, when the sun was turning into long shadows, they came into a town that Texas vaguely seemed to have seen before.

Her grandfather smiled quietly as she sat straighter in her seat, looked out of the windows and watched everything eagerly.

"Why, isn't this the sneezy town, Mr. Fitzgerald?" she said after ten minutes driving through it, "isn't this Yazoo City, Mississippi? Why—why, listen—there's a calliope!"

She was standing up now, clinging to the open window, her curls flying out in the wind.

"Why—the circus is up. It's the circus. It's here!" she cried. "The tents are all up, and the band's playing! Why, look!"

She could hardly say the words—she was laughing—crying—talking all at once. They could hear the matinée crowd cheering the closing Roman races. The limousine made its way around the big top to the back door—and the first thing Texas saw were Bum and Albert, lounging in the shade—Aunt Mary, shaking out a red coat, hanging it on a guy line in the sun.

The car had scarcely stopped before every one knew little Texas was there—and such a spilling out there was, from dressing-tent and pad-room. She hadn't time to get to the ground before she was completely surrounded. It was the turn of the others for tears and laughter then—for words that almost couldn't be said. Mr. Fitzgerald stood watching. Jim's monkey, from Jim's arms, unconventionally walked over the heads and shoulders of everybody and settled down in Texas's arms. Torchy, his crooked little face turned adoringly to hers, took her hand and kissed her fingers.

"But what happened?" she managed to ask at last. "How can we come back again when they took everything to pieces?"

Then somehow the attention of all the little crowd turned from Texas to the tall old gentleman behind her—and they seemed to look for her answer from him.

Texas, too, looked questioningly up at him—waiting for something—she didn't know what.

"The circus was for sale—so I bought it," he told her, smiling a little stiffly. "That's all. The Great Melbourne Circus belongs to Kingsley Fitzgerald."

"To you!" the child exclaimed.

"No," he smiled. "To you. Perhaps you forget that you are Kingsley Fitzgerald."

Mrs. Becker was making white cake with pink candy.

Becker was busy dressing the table with smilax!

John had made every corner a bower of flowers. Joy breathing in old walls that had so long known only somberness and silence made the hour and the day and the world very close to Heaven. The little heiress of Fitzgerald Mansion was coming home.

Her mother, glad and young and sweet, was roaming from room to room—too anxious to sit still—too happy.

In the rose-and-white room everything was ready—the doll, the poodle, an exquisite filmy frock, Miss Kent—and below the window the little boat was rocking gently on the lake.

Mr. and Mrs. Fobes sat together on the veranda, starting at every sound that might be wheels on the drive. Mr. Fitzgerald only—wasn't there.

He had said he wanted Texas to see her mother first—that she might better feel it was their home, not his, for he knew that to her he still was a stranger.

Texas had finished the season with the circus, but lately she too had begun counting weeks and days and hours for this—and at last to count minutes—ten, five, three, one. St. Louis! The waiting porter. The waiting car. People watching and whispering that this was Kingsley Fitzgerald's grandchild—the heiress to the Mansion.

And at last came the moment when little Texas rolled up that linden drive—when she held her breath with the beauty of it all, and the sight of her mother running across the lawn, arms outstretched to meet her. Mrs. Sunny—Mr. Fobes. Smiling Miss Kent—the room for a princess—a happy cuddling of the beautiful doll. Ecstasies over the poodle—the lake—the boat.

A bath, fresh curls, a great soft hair bow, the filmy dress, a beautiful tiny string of pearls——

Meg sat smilingly by and watched Miss Kent dress her little girl—a little heiress now.

"Sugarplum," she said, "do you know Mr. Fobes just makes gray hairs for himself wondering what that special reason was you found for picking him out to sit by in the boarding-house that morning? I wish you'd tell him."

Texas was thoughtful.

"Well, mother, if you think I ought to," she said.

"Yes," Meg told her, "whatever it is, I think he really ought to know."

When they went down-stairs, there was first a long silent moment before her father's picture—then the kitchen, Mrs. Becker's apple-cheeks shining with tears—and then the radiant little girl remembered Mr. Fitzgerald.

"He's on the lawn," her mother told her. "He wants you to come out when you're ready."

Texas stopped for a minute on the porch where Mr. and Mrs. Fobes were still sitting hand in hand.

"Mr. Fobes," she said, "mother wanted me to tell you the reason I felt such friends with you even before I really knew you, Mr. Fobes. You know, I was so lonesome for my friends that day—and when I saw you, you reminded me just exactly of Jim's big monkey—and he almost was the very friendliest friend I ever had—so when I saw you I wasn't lonesome at all, Mr. Fobes, and I wish there were a hundred people instead of just two, like you and Jim's monkey."

FIVE minutes later, in the warm fragrant sunshine, Mr. Fitzgerald saw her coming across the lawn—the gauzy dress blowing softly about her, Mishmer strutting beside, her hand stroking his neck, his tail spreading proudly.

Then Texas saw Mr. Fitzgerald, too—tall and straight—waiting for her. She saw a little bucket of something in his hand, and then—like the comedy mask on the velvet curtain of drama—her eager eyes discovered beside the conservatory on the sweep of velvet lawn, with the background of silver lake and snow-white swans, a dozen Plymouth Rock chickens sedately pecking the food he had thrown them. And bright as the scarlet wattles of the solemn old rooster, Texas saw underneath Mr. Fitzgerald's solemn chin—a red necktie.

"Oh," she said faintly, "oh, dear!"

Then with a wild rush she pelted into his arms. "Grandad, you old scamp," she quavered, "give Texas a kiss."

ACCEPTED BY THE LIGHT

not to rub, just a little circular working-in motion; leave it on for ten or twenty minutes, wipe off with a tissue whatever is not absorbed and you are like velvet.

Then you can use that cream we have talked about before. It is all made of eggs and orange-juice and lemon and more mysterious things than those; it looks like orange filling for a cake, and every baby tries to eat it on sight. Cleanse as always, wipe off the cream, and spread on the "orange filling." Now, if you like, you can take your hot, relaxing bath, twenty minutes or half an hour; then wipe off, pat with absorbent pad of cold tonic or run ice swiftly over the face.

A RATHER more strenuous and very effective treatment is one in which you spread on, always after cleansing, a circulation ointment, one of those dark, pungent creams that sting "like a white-hot brand" when you put it on, that keeps on stinging until the blood rises into your face redder than any blush of shame ever was. Then put on more cleansing-cream right on top of the ointment so that it will come off easily; wipe off, put on a good skin food, climb into your tub for the relaxing bath. Run ice swiftly over the face, and after the bath wipe off the food. You must take this treatment a good half-hour before going out, as the redness does not leave the face at once. Give it time to ebb before you make up. This is a specially good treatment for daytime emergency needs, as it extracts the yellow undertone and leaves the skin pinker. It tightens and firms tissues and revivifies color.

Then, there's a jolly, good-smelling mask, not so messy as most masks. You make a paste of it, with water, spread it on, up and out. Let it dry, take it off with cold water and a face-cloth, put on a skin food, wipe this off, and run ice over the face. A much firmer, cleaner, newer look results.

The hot bath can be taken when you use any of the creams, but for the masks it is better just to lie down, chin up, corners of mouth uptilted, eyes released by happy, comforting thoughts. Then take your bath afterward with the skin food on your face. There is an emergency treatment for eyes that is beautifully comforting. It's in the form of little packs of herbs which you dip in hot water and lay across the eyes, repeating this again and again. Then rest a bit of ice on the eyes for a moment. And pat under them with a special astringent for eyes.

THE only really good emergency treatment for hair that we could find comes with a little green cap on its head. It takes out the oil and rejuvenates the hair and is better than a powder shampoo. But it is better to use it two or three hours before the occasion when you want your hair to look its very best. This treatment consists of a cleansing-tonic that you put on with a bit of cotton until the hair is quite wet all over the scalp. Then take your bath, and when you get out rub the hair with a towel as if you had washed it. Brush. An hour or two later it is almost as fluffy and glad-to-be alive as if it had had a shampoo.

To be utterly accepted from all sides by the light should be one of the dreams of every Eve of us. It doesn't come all in a moment—few dreams come true all at once. But next in value to the capacity to dream and the courage to follow that dream and try to make it come true is the ability to pick yourself up after a fall, to get up again when you've been knocked down and go on. Most things lose a little of beauty as they merge out of dreams into form and actuality—whether it's a statue or a new government or a perfect make-up or love—but never mind, dream again. And again. And higher and more daringly. And then some day you will get there, and dreams will come true in all their perfection, and not only you yourself but life will be accepted by the light from all sides.

Reduce Your Weight this new scientific way!

Don't starve yourself to be slim! Don't torture yourself with hard, tiring exercises. Don't ruin your stomach with dangerous drugs. Here is the simple and pleasant new way to reduce 20, 30, 40 pounds, or more 6349—The French air of this slip-over frock comes partly from the pointed outline in which the skirt is attached and partly from the circular cut of this two-piece skirt. Use satin Canton, etc. Lower edge 2½ yards.

16 years requires 2¾ yards 39-inch crêpe satin (skirt cut crosswise to avoid piecing).

The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years, also small women.

6268—6337—The slip-over jumper or blouse of silk broadcloth, etc., and the two-piece skirt of twills, worsteds, etc., make a smart ensemble with a coat to match the skirt. The skirt is attached to an outside belt or to a camisole body. Lower edge 44 inches.

34 bust and 17 years requires 1½ yard 39-inch crêpe de Chine for blouse and 1 yard 54-inch novelty weave for skirt.

The blouse is for 32 to 44 bust; skirt for misses 15 to 20 years, also small women.

6308—A colorful dress that is nice for school or college is made of light-weight plaid or striped flannel and worn with white linen collar and cuffs. Or use light-weight wool jersey, etc., for this one-piece slip-over frock with straight lower edge. Lower edge 45 ins.

16 years requires 2 yards 54-inch wool plaid.

It is for misses 15 to 20 years, also ladies 38, 40 bust.

6328—These loose panels are trimmed with triangles of silver ribbon and attached at the hipline of a one-piece slip-over dress made of Georgette, crêpe Roma or crêpe de Chine. Or use crêpe satin, Canton crêpe or satin faille, etc. The lower edge is straight.

17 years requires 3⅝ yards 39-inch crêpe satin. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years, also small women.

6324—The mannish-style coat is used in Paris with a matching skirt and a silk blouse, or with a matching silk dress, for a new ensemble costume called the redingote. The coat may be made of tweeds or mannish suitings.

17 years requires 2⅞ yards 48-inch novelty weave. Lower edge 51½ inches.

The coat is for misses 16 to 20 years, also small women.

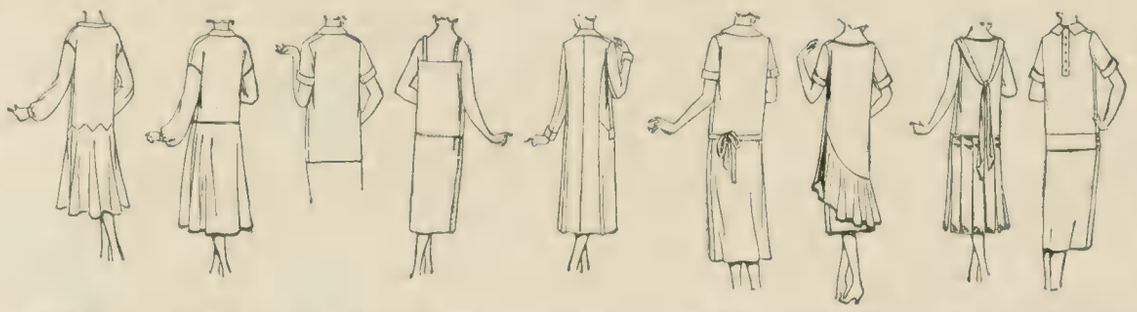
16 years requires 2⅝ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine (skirt cut crosswise) and ⅞ yard 39-inch Georgette. Lower edge 2⅛ yards.

The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years, also small women; hat for misses and ladies.

6330—This enchanting frock with a circular flounce may have a day neck and a short sleeve instead of a cut-down armhole. Use Georgette or crêpe de Chine, plain or printed, or crêpe Roma for this one-piece slip-over dress. For day wear use crêpe satin, etc.



16 years requires 3 yards 40-inch printed Georgette. Lower edge 42½ inches.

The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years.

6281—A practical one-piece slip-over dress with a great deal of style is made in a two-piece effect with an inverted plait set in the center front. It fits closely at the hipline and the lower edge is straight. Use plain flannels, etc. It may have an open-neck collar.

17 years requires 4¼ yards 27-inch plain flannel. Lower edge 50 inches.

It is for misses 15 to 20 years, also ladies 38, 40 bust.

6306—A new sleeve distinguishes this one-piece dress which fits closely at the hipline. The lower edge is straight and the dress slips on over the head. Use twills, worsteds, cashmere or wool crêpe with plaid silk or contrasting crêpe de Chine or silk crêpe, etc.

16 years requires 1¾ yard 54-inch twill, ¾ yard 35-inch plaid silk. Lower edge 42 ins.

It is for misses 15 to 20 years, also ladies 38, 40 bust.

6302—The flared coat is popular for the new ensemble costume. This one puts its circular flare across the back and keeps the front straight. Use short-nap coatings, cashmere coatings, suède-finished coatings, velours, kasha duvetyn, kasha, broadcloth or smooth-faced plain coatings, etc.

18 years requires 2⅝ yards 54-inch cashmere coating. Lower edge 2 yards.

The coat is for misses 15 to 20 years, ladies 38 to 44 bust.

6303—This straight-line coat with a dress to match its lining makes a very smart general wear ensemble. Use tweeds, cashmere cheviots, novelty weaves or camel's-hair, with plain or plaid twill flannel for lining. The lower edge is straight.

34 bust or 17 years requires 3 yards 54-inch wool plaid. Lower edge 44 inches.

The coat is for misses 16 to 18 years, ladies 33 to 52 bust.

6275—10342—A lovely afternoon frock has a circular flounce across the front. The embroidery is decorative. Work in self-color. This one-piece slip-over frock fits closely at the hipline. Lower edge 43½ inches.

35 bust or 18 years requires 3¼ yards 39-inch crêpe satin (flounce cut crosswise to avoid piecing) and 1 yard 39-inch chiffon.

It is for misses 33 to 35 bust or 16 to 18 years, also ladies.

6322—The bolero front of this slip-over dress makes it appealingly youthful. The one-piece back has an inverted plait down its center. Use tweeds, worsteds, cashmere, wool crêpe, kasha, etc. The lower edge is straight. Lower edge, plaits out, 56 inches.

16 years requires 2⅞ yards 39-inch cashmere and ⅞ yard 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

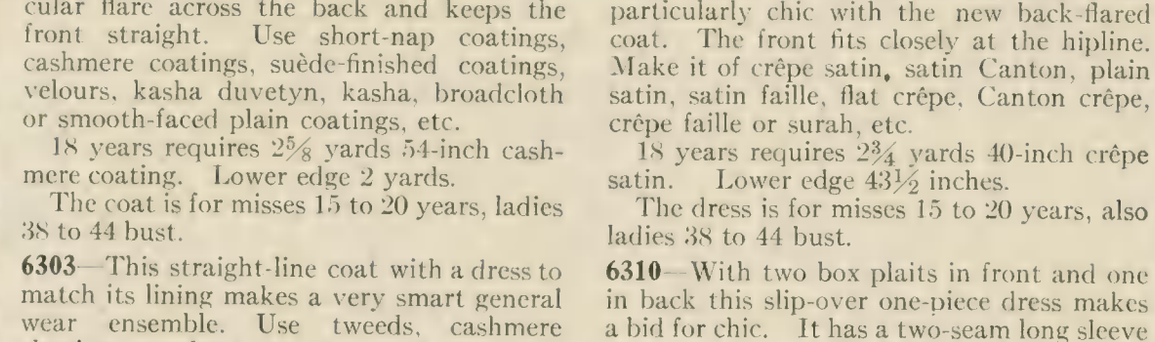
The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years, also small women.

6299—The circular flare attached across the back makes this one-piece slip-over frock particularly chic with the new back-flared coat. The front fits closely at the hipline. Make it of crêpe satin, satin Canton, plain satin, satin faille, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille or surah, etc.

18 years requires 2¾ yards 40-inch crêpe satin. Lower edge 43½ inches.

The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years, also ladies 38 to 44 bust.

6310—With two box plaits in front and one in back this slip-over one-piece dress makes a bid for chic. It has a two-seam long sleeve or a one-seam short sleeve and a straight lower edge. Use twills, worsteds, cashmere, serge, wool crêpe, camel's-hair twills or checks, etc. Lower edge, plaits out, 59 ins.



17 years requires 2⅜ yards 54-inch kasha.

The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years, also small women.

18 years requires 2¾ yards 54-inch kasha.

The coat is for misses 15 to 20 years, ladies 38 to 44 bust.

$100,000
For better face powder

By Edna Wallace Hopper

I will place a $100,000 order with anyone who can produce a face powder better than mine. My scientific advisers to be the deciders.

For years and years I paid $5 per box for my powder. I had it made to my order. We on the stage and in Movieland are careful of our looks. And we are extravagant.

Then I offered my chief beauty helps to all. I placed them with toilet counters everywhere. Multitudes of women adopted them, then they asked me what powders I employed.

I could not tell them. Few women, outside my stage friends, would pay the price I paid. But I finally induced the makers to supply this same powder in quantities. I offered to buy a million boxes if powders like mine could be sold at modest prices.

As a result, my identical powders are now at your command. All toilet counters now supply them in my name. There are two kinds. One is a cold cream powder which clings and stays. I prefer that. But I have the same powders made light and fluffy for women who wish this type. The prices are 50c and $1. Both come in white, flesh and brunette and peach.

These are superlative powders, fine as vapor, harmless as dew. Fragrant with my favorite perfume. They will bring you new conceptions of fine powders.

All toilet counters supply Edna Wallace Hopper's beauty helps. Mail the coupon for sample and my Beauty Book.

A Complete
HEALTH FOOD DIRECTORY

MILO HASTINGS, Director of Physical Culture Health Food Laboratory, has compiled from his vast store of information a complete health food directory. Instead of writing a great volume, making it necessary for you to read hundreds of pages in order to secure the knowledge you desire, he has compiled a series of tables dealing with the values and effects of hundreds of different kinds of foods in connection with specific health conditions, weaknesses or results to be obtained.

To illustrate, if you are overweight and wish to reduce, you turn to the weight reduction table and tell at a glance just which foods will help you to reduce, which will not add to your weight and which will make you fat. If you wish you can make your own menus from among the weight reducing or non-fat producing foods that appeal to you, or you can select your meals complete from among the dozens of carefully worked out menus supplied by Mr. Hastings.

The same is true for gaining weight, building vitality, disease resistance, conquering constipation, growth, building muscular power and others.

Another feature that you will find of unusual value is the complete and unbiased tabulation and rating of popular trade marked and branded foods.

The text is brief and to the point—the essence of information concentrated and boiled down for instant use. No one has ever before published such a book.

Supply Will Go Quickly

Ordinarily material of this nature would be built up into an elaborate beautifully bound volume and sold for several dollars a copy. The publisher would become rich from its sale because countless thousands of people would gladly pay any price for the invaluable information it contained. But Bernarr Macfadden, Father of Physical Culture, under whose auspices this unique book is being published, would not have it that way. To his way of thinking, no one has a right to exploit for profit information of such tremendous import to the human race.

Accordingly, a special edition of "Physical Culture Health Food Directory" has been published as economically as possible consistent with good workmanship and material. While they last they will be supplied at the nominal price of 25c per copy—actually below cost, postage and handling considered. You realize how quickly an offer of this nature will be snapped up by eager thousands, so in order to be sure of getting your copy we earnestly advise you to send for it at once. A coupon is provided for your convenience. Make use of it to-day.

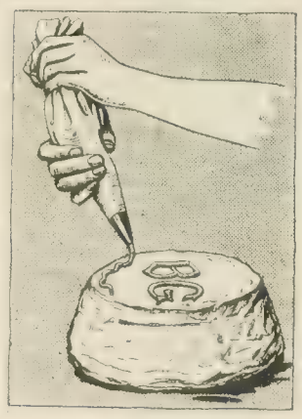
Every Housewife Should Make His Acquaintance

He is sectioned off and numbered so that she can tell at a glance where the nineteen different cuts of beef come from. Beef, lamb, pork—all of them are sectioned off in The New Butterick Cook Book, and the various uses and characteristics of each cut are also given. Do you know, for instance, that a clod of beef makes excellent pot-roast, braised beef and casserole dishes? Or that a shoulder of pork is delicious when stuffed and roasted? You can buy less expensive cuts and have excellent results if you follow The New Butterick Cook Book—the great new kind of cook book that gives you not only delicious menus and recipes, but also tells you all about food, how to buy it, carve it, serve it, etc., etc.

Can You Fillet a Fish?

Pictures and instructions in The New Butterick Cook Book show you clearly how to do it from start to finish. And the result? Delicious fillet of sole. Pictures also show you how to dress a lobster, soft and hard shell crabs, truss a chicken, carve a turkey, etc.



Setting the Table for a Formal Luncheon

Pictures in The New Butterick Cook Book also show you how to set the table for breakfast, a formal dinner party, trays for invalids, iced drinks, etc. You are told how to place dishes, pass food, serve in Russian and in English style.

Decorating with a Pastry Bag

There are pictures of pastry tubes in various sizes and shapes, and many recipes for frostings. This illustration shows you how to hold and squeeze the bag after you fill it.

6350—Quite different is a slip-over dress that attaches its front apron in an unusual outline and has plaits at the center and side back. Use crêpe faille, crêpe satin, satin Canton, satin faille, flat crêpe or Canton crêpe with facings of collar and tie ends of grosgrain ribbon, etc. Lower edge, plaits drawn out, 1⅞ yard.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6302—A new coat puts the circular flare across the back. This coat, with the dress shown at its left for general wear and the frock at its right for more formal use, makes a very complete ensemble suit for any daytime occasion. Make the coat of short-nap coatings, cashmere coatings, kasha duvetyn, kasha broadcloth, smooth-faced plain coatings, etc., or use plain ribbed silk with kasha for lining, etc. Lower edge 2 yards.

19 years or 36 bust requires 2¾ yards 54-inch suède-finished coating.

The coat is for ladies 38 to 44 bust, misses 15 to 20 years.

6332—This slip-over dress makes a lovely second frock for an ensemble suit. It should match the lining of the coat. The circular flounce of deeply curved outline lengthens the one-piece upper part. Use broché crêpe faille or broché crêpe satin with plain to match; crêpe satin, satin Canton, plain satin or satin faille with contrasting silk crêpe; Canton crêpe, flat crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine, etc. Lower edge 2¼ yards.

36 bust requires 3⅛ yards 39-inch silk crêpe. (Flounce cut crosswise to avoid piecing.)

The dress is charming for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6312—Twills, worsteds, cashmere, wool crêpe, kasha or camel's-hair twills with heavy silk crêpe in a contrasting color makes this one-piece dress with a long vest front. It slips on over the head and has an inverted plait at the back. The lower edge is straight. Serge with satin to harmonize may also be used or satin with a contrasting heavy silk crêpe. Lower edge, plaits drawn out, 1¾ yard.

36 bust requires 2⅛ yards of 54-inch twill and 1½ yard 35 or 39 inch contrasting material.

This dress is for ladies 32 to 48 bust.

36 bust requires 2¾ yards 54-inch twill and ½ yard 35 or 39 inch contrasting material. Lower edge, plaits drawn out, 2¼ yards.

The dress is smart for ladies 32 to 46 bust.

6326—The center-front inverted plait makes its first appearance combined with a flare. The lower part of this slip-over dress is attached in a fancy outline and has a plait at the center front and each side back. Use crêpe satin, satin Canton, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, satin faille or heavy crêpe de Chine, all of one material or with the same material in contrast. It may have a body lining. Lower edge with plaits out 2⅜ yards.

This dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

Something NEW for BOBBED HAIR

There is a tremendous difference in bobs. Some are wonderfully attractive and becoming, while others, well—which kind is yours?

I wish you could picture the becoming kind I have in mind—the sort that makes men turn to admire. I can't tell you what the color is, but it's full of those tiny dancing lights that somehow suggest auburn, yet which are really no more actual color than sunlight is. It's only when the head is moved that you catch the auburn suggestion—the fleeting glint of gold.

You have no idea how much your bob can be improved with the "tiny tint" Golden Glint Shampoo will give it. If you want a bob like that I have in mind, buy a package and see for yourself. At all drug stores, or send 25c direct to J. W. KOBI CO., 670 Rainier Ave., Seattle, Wn.

6321—6246—A bolero front, a one-piece back and a tucked or gathered vest front make this slip-over frock. Use serge, flannel, etc. The tam-o'-shanter is gored.

12 years requires 1⅝ yard 54-inch soft twill and ⅞ yard 35-inch plaid silk for dress.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years; tam for girls, children, misses, ladies.

6329—6188—A bolero effect is given to this slip-over one-piece dress by bands. The tam-o'-shanter may be plaited or gathered.

7 years and 20-inch head measure require 1½ yard 39-inch wool crêpe for dress, with ⅜ yard 36-inch silk for tam.

The dress is for girls 6 to 10 years old; tam for girls, children, misses and ladies.

6311—5212—A little smocked slip-over dress has a straight lower edge and separate bloomers. The hat has hand-made rosebuds.

4 years and 19¾-inch head measure require 2¼ yards 32-inch chambray and ½ yard 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

The dress is for little girls 2 to 6 years; hat for girls 2 to 12.

6288—6323—A smart little ensemble costume puts this slip-over dress and separate bloomers with the coat shown beside it. The hat has a six-gored crown.

4 years requires 2⅛ yards 35-inch lightweight flannel for dress.

The dress is for little girls 2 to 6 years; hat for little girls and tiny boys 2 to 8 years.

6335—6327—As an ensemble costume, this coat with its circular flare attached across its back is excellent with the dress shown beside it. The hat has a six-gored crown.

12 years requires 1⅞ yard 54-inch soft pile fabric for coat.

The coat is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years; hat for girls 2 to 12.

6317—6323—A six-gored-crown hat is smart with a single-breasted overcoat. The collar is convertible. Use homespun, tweeds, etc.

2 years and 18¾-inch head measure require 1¼ yards 44-inch wool material for coat; ½ yard 27-inch flannel for hat.

The coat is for little boys 2 to 7 years; hat for little girls and tiny boys 2 to 8.

7 years takes 1⅜ yd. 54-in. tweed for coat.

The coat is for little girls 1 to 7 years; tam-o'-shanter for girls, children, misses and ladies.

6307—5557—The long upper part of this slip-over dress has a straight lower edge and is lengthened by a straight band. The hat has a four-gored crown.

8 years requires 1⅛ yard 35-inch crêpe de Chine for dress, with 1 yard 35-inch crêpe de Chine for yoke and bands.

Dress for girls 6 to 10; hat for girls 2 to 12.

4 years requires 1½ yard 44-inch wool material for coat.

The coat is for girls and small boys 1 to 7 years; hat for little girls and tiny boys 2 to 8.

6309—6327—A straight band lengthens the long upper part of this slip-over dress. With the coat beside it, it makes a smart ensemble costume. The hat has a six-gored crown.

12 years requires 1⅜ yard 35-inch silk crêpe, with ⅝ yard 54-inch cloth for dress.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years; hat for girls 2 to 12.

6315—A skirt of two circular flounces is very attractive when one is very young. Make this slip-over one-piece dress of Georgette, taffeta or radium with ribbon girdle, etc. The fabric flower is hand made.

13 years requires 3¾ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

It is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6345—5952—Cashmere cheviots, novelty weaves, camel's-hair or homespun with plaid lining makes this straight-line coat with a plait at the lower part of the front. The hat with a six-gored crown is made of flannel, etc.

12 years requires 1⅞ yard 54-inch tweed for coat.

The coat is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years; hat for girls, misses and ladies.

6341—The circular flare takes a new position on a slip-over dress when it appears across the sides. Use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, plain taffeta or radium; or use plain or checked soft twills or checked taffeta with plain.

12 years requires 2⅜ yards 39-inch flat crêpe.

It is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6333—This dress has two slashes—one for a pocket, one to run a tab through. It is of the one-piece type and slips on over the head. Use stripes in twills, wool crêpe, serge, etc.

12 years requires 2⅞ yards 27-inch striped flannel.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6325—An adorable little suit is this one consisting of a waist and straight trousers. Make it of chambray, poplin, linen-finished cottons, madras, piqué or wool jersey; or use cotton rep in two colors, etc.

4 years requires 1¼ yard 35-inch linen.

The suit is for little boys 2 to 6 years.

6347—6246—The schoolgirl will like this smart slip-over dress with two-piece circular skirt attached to a long body, and she finds the gored tam-o'-shanter chic.

12 years requires 2 yards 48-inch soft twill for dress.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years; tam for girls, children, misses, ladies.

6319—6327—Soft pile fabrics, cashmere coatings, broadcloth, kasha, camel's-hair twill, velveteen or velours makes this coat. A circular flare is attached across the front. The hat has a six-gored crown.

13 years requires 3⅜ yards 35-inch velveteen for coat.

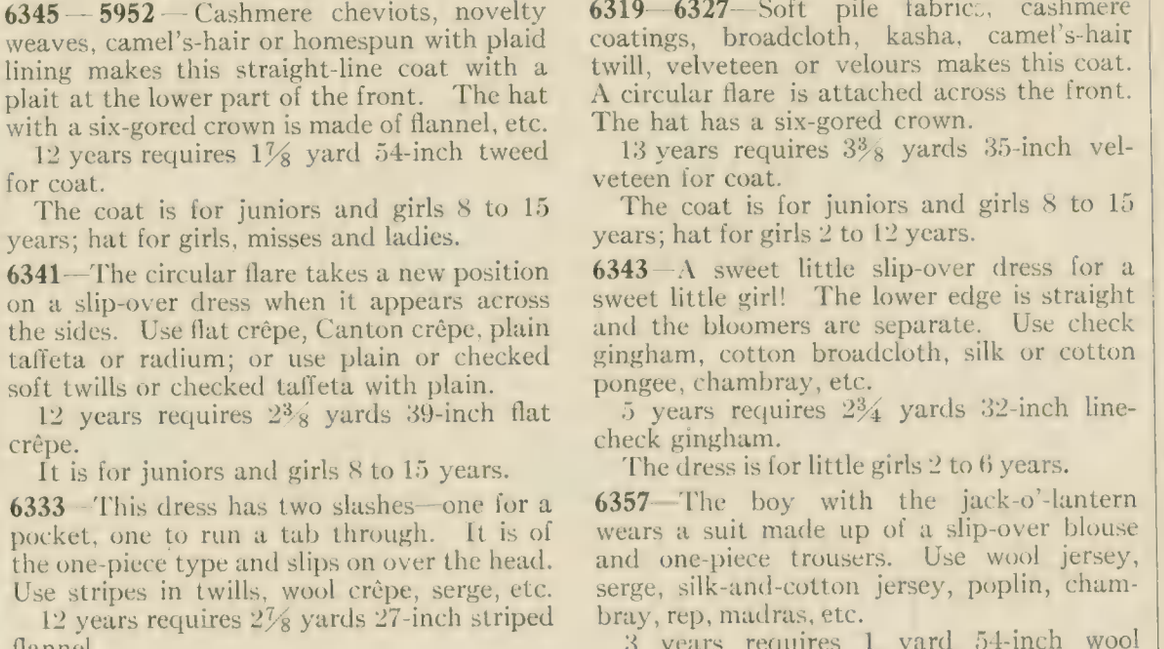
The coat is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years; hat for girls 2 to 12 years.

6343—A sweet little slip-over dress for a sweet little girl! The lower edge is straight and the bloomers are separate. Use check gingham, cotton broadcloth, silk or cotton pongee, chambray, etc.

5 years requires 2¾ yards 32-inch line-check gingham.

The dress is for little girls 2 to 6 years.

6357—The boy with the jack-o'-lantern wears a suit made up of a slip-over blouse and one-piece trousers. Use wool jersey, serge, silk-and-cotton jersey, poplin, chambray, rep, madras, etc.



3 years requires 1 yard 54-inch wool jersey.

The suit is for little boys 2 to 7 years.

6313—When one is seven one hopes for a party dress with hand-made roses. Use silk or cotton Georgette, net, etc., for this one-piece slip-over frock with straight lower edge.

7 years requires 2⅛ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

Lovely teeth shining white

But what would the X-ray reveal?

THIS X-ray shows tooth socket destruction by pyorrhea

BEAUTIFUL white teeth, free from decay, are not safe unless the gums are healthy. If pyorrhea attacks your gums, an X-ray would reveal how quickly the infection spreads to the root sockets which hold the teeth in place. If pyorrhea is not checked, your teeth fall out—or must be pulled—because their support is gone.

Tender, bleeding gums
—nature's warning of pyorrhea's approach

DENTAL clinics since 1908 have proved the effectiveness of Pyorrhocide Powder as an aid to correct bleeding gums, strengthen tender gums, harden soft gums.

It keeps the teeth white and clean. Its tonic and stimulating qualities help healthy gums to keep healthy. It is medicated with Dentinol, a gum-tissue healing agent widely used by dentists in the treatment of pyorrhea.

Use Pyorrhocide Powder daily—see your dentist regularly—and you can avoid pyorrhea. The economical dollar package contains six months' supply. At all druggists. Send for free sample and booklet on causes and prevention of pyorrhea.

A Welcome To Newcomers

Our experience in former years leads us to expect that the next few weeks, the period just before Winter sets in, will bring us more new readers than for any similar space of time in the course of the year. Our new friends should know THE DELINEATOR is primarily a service magazine. Here and there throughout each issue are offerings of information and equipment to be had from our editorial department heads and their expert advisers. Thousands of letters from grateful women testify to the value of this service; similar satisfaction is yours for the asking.

A letter from an American resident of Vienna, Austria, reminded us of our intention to publish occasional excerpts from readers' comments. This particular correspondent tells us we can't possibly appreciate the value of THE DELINEATOR to an American in a foreign country, where the fashion periodicals are impossible because they picture children dressed as nearly as possible like their elders! "Furthermore," she writes, "patterns for children are unsightly and foolish because they are all made for skinny children."

Another letter with a foreign background is worth quoting in full because it is a measure of the extent of the magazine's influence. It comes from Vancouver, B. C. "THE DELINEATOR is a magazine I really love, and though I can not claim as long a friendship with it as many of your readers can, I have been at least a persistent follower since I discovered it. That was in Glasgow some years ago, when I enjoyed its stories, then in France for over two years during the war when my sister used to send it over to me. Later I came to Winnipeg with a girl friend, and though we had rather a struggle at first we usually managed to scrape up enough to get our DELINEATOR every month. We had to make all our own clothes, so to the stories were added the fashions and patterns. Now I am a wife and mother, and there isn't an article I miss in the whole magazine. All the columns pertaining to the house and children have been a wonderful help as well as being very interesting. I do not know of any other magazine that gets just that intimate personal touch which you succeed in getting. All your contributors seem to have it, so that one feels as though one were thanking one person who understood you and was helping you out."—C. G. L.

"You are giving the world one of its finest and best journals. I've been a subscriber off and on ever since its existence when it was a little tan-colored paper-back pamphlet—maybe two dozen leaves. Behold it now! So you see we've grown old together. My daughter, or several of them, have it come in their homes. We all feel everything is due you each one—everything that is good, useful and beautiful—for its editing."—J. B. R.

From Vernonia, Oregon:

"This is almost a personal thank you, for I surely have a very personal feeling for THE DELINEATOR, having read it almost constantly for many years—about thirty or more. Even before I had a home of my own, my mother used to take it, and we feel that we could not get along without it. But my reason for writing this letter is to thank you for the short story in the last (April) issue entitled "Good Sports," so interesting, so human and so wholesome. If we might have such stories and such people, the highly colored and questionable triangle and the shady tragedies would lose their interest and their influence, and people might try harder to solve their real and imaginary problems in such a different and decent way. Again thanking you for the pleasure I get from our DELINEATOR."—MRS. F. R.

From Kingman, Indiana:

"I am writing this to say that THE DELINEATOR has been received regularly in our home since October 1879, first by my mother, now ninety years old, and in later years by myself. We have now the October number 1879—a very different magazine from the one now published."—A. M. H.

From Auburn, Alabama:

"May your stories ever hold their quality and wholesome cleanliness."—MRS. W. G. B.

From Washington, D. C.:

"All good wishes for THE DELINEATOR. For nearly fifty years I have considered it a Beacon Light to Woman."—MRS. I. J. K.

ASK THE DELINEATOR

We are glad to offer our readers the following services; and we hope they will have no hesitation in consulting our department experts on any personal or household problem. Be sure (1) to address your inquiry to THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.; (2) to give us your return address; (3) to enclose the cost of the pamphlet or other literature (in each case a minimum amount fixed to cover cost of printing and postage)

Babies and Children—Join one or more of THE DELINEATOR Happy Child Clubs. Every month Dr. Henry L. K. Shaw, Director of The Happy Child Department, writes you a timely letter. He takes your child step by step through the year, tells you what to do each month.

There are four clubs, one for expectant mothers, one for the "new baby," a third for little runabouts, and one for the school child.

Membership in any one is only fifty cents a year. Or you can join all four for one dollar.

Send for one or all of the important Child Health pamphlets. They cost only ten cents each and treat the following subjects: "The Expectant Mother and the New Baby," "The General Care of the Baby," "Maternal Nursing," "Artificial Feeding," "Diet Problems of Childhood," "Early Childhood," "The Child's Teeth," "The School Child," "The Mental Health of the Child," "Three Dread Diseases of Childhood," "Play, Eyes and Movies," "Correct Posture," "The Development of Personality," "Widespread and Dangerous Diseases," and "Weight, Growth and Health."

Are you getting ready for the new baby? Our Pattern Department has just issued an up-to-date collection of layette patterns. These have been prepared under the direction of several State and municipal maternity and nursing organizations.

The whole group of patterns—a complete outfit for the baby, with the Deltor, containing full directions—can be procured for thirty-five cents from any Butterick pattern dealer or by writing to the Pattern Department of THE DELINEATOR, New York, N. Y.

Home-Making—This department has a score of leaflets that will help you to systematize, simplify and improve your housekeeping. Write for a list of them, enclosing a two-cent stamp for postage.

Building and Decoration—If you want to build, write for pictures of all Donn Barber's model houses, costing you only two cents for return postage. Then for one dollar you may order a print of floor-plans and elevations of the house you decide upon.

Ask Mrs. Sanders, the editor of this department, about furnishing and decorating (not more than five questions at one time, please). Be sure to give full description of rooms—and a two-cent stamp for reply.

Special bulletins, "Good Floors," "Curtains and Draperies," "Walls, Woodwork and Ceilings," "Furnishing the Home," "How to Choose, Frame and Hang Your Pictures," "How to Know Good Furniture," "Methods of Painting Furniture" and "Slip Covers and How to Make Them," may be had for twenty-five cents each.

Beauty—The beauty editor will answer personal questions and send complimentary folders on the care of skin, hands and hair, or lotions and cosmetics. Enclose postage at rate of two cents for two folders.

Etiquette—A new booklet called "Table Hospitality" gives explicit directions for setting the table for formal and informal meals and for entertaining with and without a maid. This is ten cents, and Mrs. John Cabot Kimberley will answer any personal quandary or send instructive leaflets on phases of etiquette, such as "Courtesies of To-day between Men and Women" and "Introductions, Invitations and Replies," on receipt of two-cents postage.

Entertainment—That ghostly tap, tap on the window-pane may be only the October wind, but what a promise of spooky thrills it brings! Write to Miss Margaret Campion at THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, enclosing a two-cent stamp for postage, and ask for her leaflets, "A Poe Hallowe'en" or "A Money-Making Hallowe'en Entertainment," for your church or club.

MIX and SERVE

Edited with Willing Hands and a Mean Pencil by a Mere Man

NEWS to make countless thousands mourn comes from the little province of Bologna, Italy, which attained world-wide fame through its major industry, the production of Bologna sausage. The industry is threatened with extinction because of high import tariffs and the scarcity of hogs ◈◈◈ Another alarming news item from abroad is the opinion of a National Institute of Medical Research savant (London) to the effect that girls are rapidly becoming more healthy than boys because low-cut frocks, short skirts and rolled stockings permit stimulating ultra-violet rays to enter the body ◈◈◈ Some of our readers will find compensation for this threat in the opinion of another eminent Britisher, Sir William Arbuthnot Lane, who says that "woman is much more simian than man, and by natural instinct imitative." He deplores the use of health-destroying rubber reducing devices worn by women who imitate their slenderer sisters. His ideal woman, from a health point of view, is the negress who eats coarse food and carries weights on her head ◈◈◈ It is a pleasure to report that the cause of equal rights for the never-sufficiently-praised sex is being admirably served in some of our law courts ◈◈◈ For instance, a Brooklyn, New York, girl sued her employer for $10,000 on the ground that he had stolen a kiss. The jury heard the evidence, compared the young lady's six feet of stature and hundred and sixty pounds of weight with the five-foot defendant's scant one hundred pounds and awarded the lady eighteen cents as balm for her outraged feelings ◈◈◈ Another litigant, a Boston, Mass., lady, sued a street railway company for $25,000 damages because of injuries sustained in an accident. The jury awarded her $1,500 on the theory that, as she was eighty-two years old, she could not reasonably expect to live long enough to enjoy the full amount of her claim ◈◈◈ H. B. McDermott, a bed-ridden invalid in a St. Paul, Minnesota, hospital, won first place in a fancy needlework contest in which his competitors were a thousand women ◈◈◈ A student of journalism at the University of Illinois conducted an inquiry to find out what women in small towns talk about. The conversations of eighty-two rural women were recorded at social gatherings. Local and general crime news was the topic of the largest number of discussions. Next in importance came bobbed hair, visitors, crops and athletics. Then followed, in order, new residents, illness, radio, school-teachers, persons who moved away, poverty and the high cost of living, household conveniences and inventions, work and worry, shopping, household hints and recipes, politics, styles and poultry ◈◈◈ At a recent congress of German hotel porters held in Berlin, the delegates advocated abolition of brass buttons, which they felt were not in keeping with the serious importance of their calling. As a substitute they suggested a plain frock coat suitable for afternoon wear ◈◈◈ From Colorado Springs comes the story of an inspector of schools who was visiting a class of high-school girls. He wrote on the blackboard LXXX, and turning to a bright-looking miss, said: "Young lady, I'd like to have you tell me what that means." "Love and kisses," was the prompt reply ◈◈◈ After the city council of Kemsett, Arizona, passed an ordinance prohibiting singing, whistling or otherwise expressing the song, "'Tain't Gonna Rain No More," the long-continued drought and heat wave was broken by showers and the temperature dropped nearly forty degrees ◈◈◈ The United Restaurant Owners' Association recently took a poll of 180,000 patrons to determine their favorite dish. Corned Beef and Cabbage led easily, with Vegetable Dinner, Veal Cutlet, Long Island Duck, Filet Mignon and Roast Beef trailing ◈◈◈ The manager of a large insurance office has almost invariably been able to distinguish married men from single when applicants for positions called on him. He has finally divulged his secret: the married men wipe their feet on the mat; the single ones don't ◈◈◈ A famous Spanish portrait painter who has been visiting here says that Spanish women have the most beautiful knees in the world because they spend so much time praying ◈◈◈ Our fair pewholders might emulate their example, provided they don't encroach on the time set aside for answering advertisements in THE DELINEATOR ◈◈◈

An attractive rug that's play-proof!

Their very own room! A place where they can play any game they like—and no one ever says, "Don't do that, you'll ruin the rug!" For this rug is Congoleum—so sturdy that it stands the scuffing of tireless little feet without a sign of wear.

Sanitary—Waterproof

Congoleum Gold Seal Rugs are sanitary—and that's another important point for rooms where children spend much of their time. The surface is smooth, waterproof, and seamless—no place for crumbs or germs to lurk.

Dust can't sift under the edges of these rugs for they hug the floor yet require neither tacks nor cement to hold them in place. And a few strokes of a damp mop make them spotless.

Then, cheerful beauty! All children love color. And the designs in Congoleum Gold Seal Rugs are marvels of artistic color combinations.

Big in Value—Low in Price

Congoleum Gold Seal Rugs are very inexpensive. When you buy a Congoleum Rug you have secured the utmost floor-covering value that your money can buy anywhere!

You must see these rugs to appreciate them fully. Just visit your dealer's and look over the many patterns. There are sizes for every room—from small mats to large room-sized rugs.

The BATH SOAP

FAIRY SOAP

Renew Your Vitality!

A BATH is the great natural restorer of vitality which has been reduced by hard work, strenuous sport, or the strain of steady mental effort.

Dr. Edmund C. Gray, noted authority on natural hygiene, says:

> "For quick renewal of vitality, for calling back the forces of youth, for giving that renewed freshness, vivacity and optimism of younger years—nothing can surpass the bath."

The bath removes the causes of that "tired feeling" by increasing blood circulation and stimulating pore action.

Fairy Soap is a delightful adjunct to the bath. It assists nature to throw off harmful waste matter by proper regulation of the pores.

Fairy Soap is a perfectly pure soap made especially for the bath.

COURAGE

ARMISTICE DAY and Thanksgiving, two of our great national days which some divine chance has put in the same month. To most of us the first Armistice Day meant simply peace, a sudden silencing of the guns, an end to struggle and heart-break. Now most of us know better. We know that for the courageous souls who fight the battles of the world there is never any peace. For the scientist who risks his life to win victories over disease there is no peace. For the educator in his ceaseless battle with ignorance there is no peace. For millions of men and women struggling every day to give their children better opportunities than they have known there is no peace. For the hosts of brave unsung spirits who never accept half-way ideals even in the smallest events of daily living there is no peace.

But though we realize there is no peace, the thought need not depress us. We have something far greater to be thankful for. We have courage.

Courage is the virtue that made the first Armistice Day possible. Without it other virtues amount to nothing. By this we mean, of course, not simply physical courage, but mental and moral courage. It is the backbone of character, the upright quality that keeps us pointing to the stars, the bright banner in the forefront of any victory, personal or national. Let us, on this Armistice Day, be thankful for courage.

NATIONAL EDUCATION WEEK

BETTER education, an increase in sobriety, and an advanced standard of living have resulted in a tremendous decrease of crime in England in the last fifty years, according to a recent statement by Sir William Joynson-Hicks, British Home Secretary.

Could there be any more direct proof that education and good citizenship go together?

This month will see National Education week celebrated all over the United States. It is designed to remind us of exactly that fact which England has so convincingly demonstrated. Education is preparation for life, and since crime is failure to adjust oneself to life as it is, better education naturally means less crime.

Better education depends largely on better teaching. A school is not the bricks and mortar in which it is housed; it is the soul and vision of the men and women in it. Because THE DELINEATOR feels this so strongly, and believes that the teaching profession—surely one of the noblest in the world—is not attracting to itself as many able men and women as it ought; because, in fact, one hundred thousand teachers deserted the profession last year, we decided to carry this matter directly to the people most concerned—parents and teachers—and ask them to tell us "What is the matter with teaching?"

Dr. John Dewey, one of the foremost educators in the country, told us in last month's magazine what he thought was the matter. Other well-known people who have this problem at heart will discuss the question in later issues. In addition we are urging our readers to give us their opinions. For details of our prize contest, read the box on this page.

THE END OF PROGRESS—OR THE BEGINNING?

A GREAT spiritual leader of another country recently expressed her conviction that only by cultivating her soul could America escape the fate of other great civilizations that have gone before. We must not let our national spirit, she declared, grow fat and slothful with prosperity.

I think that danger, if it exists at all, is a long way off. In our response to two great opportunities for service, this month, we will give spontaneous proof.

To fight leprosy in our island possessions, General Wood, Governor General of the Philippines, is asking the people of the United States for one million dollars. There, where over five thousand afflicted ones have been segregated in the leper colony of Culion, we Americans have an opportunity to carry on scientific investigations which may bring back to happiness thousands of miserable people. Ultimately, perhaps we may wipe leprosy from the earth.

Even here in the United States we have a sizable leper colony. That this scourge may not be brought closer to home, the disease must be stamped out at its source.

Until very recently leprosy was regarded as incurable. The method of treating those who developed it was simple: The burial service was read over them and they were driven outside the city limits. Legally, they were dead. Actually, they lived on through years of misery, feared and hated and spreading infection which could not be thus legislated out of existence.

Western nations, going into tropical countries, have endeavored to meet the problem by segregating the leper, and Western scientists have searched for a cure. A few years ago their patience was rewarded, and the world thrilled to hear that a cure had been found. Several lepers had been healed by treatment with chaulmoogra oil. This brought help, however, to only a few of the thousands of sufferers, since the treatment was comparatively expensive, required a long time, and had other serious drawbacks. Many of these drawbacks science has now overcome, but lack of money is still the great obstacle.

The Philippine Government now appropriates each year for the fight against leprosy over $600,000, nearly two per cent. of its entire revenue. This is about all that it can do. So General Wood has come directly to the American people for help. Checks—any amount is welcome—may be sent directly to the War Department in Washington. Your letters should be addressed to General Frank McIntyre, Chief, Insular Bureau War Department, Washington, D. C.

THE second way in which we will show that America's soul is not "fat and slothful with prosperity" will be in our answer to the Annual Red Cross drive for membership this month.

I wish I could make all of you realize just what the Red Cross means to you—to every home in the country. The peaceful little towns in Illinois, Indiana and Missouri probably were not giving much thought to the Red Cross just before the cyclone swept over them last March. But now they know about it. They found out ten hours after the whirling destruction hit them.

Mr. Henry M. Baker, director of disaster relief, who happened to be in St. Louis at the time, sent eighty nurses at once to the stricken area.

Alexandria County Chapter of Cairo, Illinois, only one of many, sent an emergency unit on a special train with doctors, nurses, cots, food, drugs, bandages and two thousand blankets. The Red Cross First Aid Railroad Car fortunately was at Indianapolis. It was rushed to the scene with a staff of a medical chief, nurses and surgeons.

Special hospital equipment such as portable X-ray machines and surgical appliances were also brought into the area for use in fracture cases. Airplanes were used to rush anti-tetanus serum to the points where it was most needed.

But the Red Cross does not stop with binding the wounds of the injured. It always tries, in case of disaster, to restore families as nearly as possible to normal living conditions. In the cyclone district ruin threatened the farmers because the devastation came within two weeks of crop-planting time. One of the first things needed was to clear the fields for immediate plowing. Two Red Cross rural clean-up caravans of about fifty men each started to sweep through the worst-hit counties, and not only cleared away the wreckage, but wherever possible set up temporary pasture fences and helped in other ways.

But fights like these against mankind's great scourges, that are being waged by so many organizations and scientists and great leaders, are not the signs of degeneracy and decline!

We are healing the wounds of centuries of war and disease. We are making many mistakes, it is true, but so long as stirring activities are undertaken every day, so long as the whole nation keeps an open heart and an open mind, our civilization is not endangered. We have not reached a peak from which we will sink to disgrace and oblivion. We are just beginning to climb!

$2,000 IN PRIZES!

"What is the matter with the teaching profession and how may its evils be cured?"

For the best answers to this question THE DELINEATOR is offering $2,000 in prizes, as follows:

To Teachers: A first prize of $500, a second of $300, and a third of $200.

To Parents (and others not teachers, but interested in education): First prize, $500; a second prize, $300; a third prize, $200.

This contest was fully discussed on the editorial page of the October issue. You do not have to be an experienced writer to take part in it. We simply want you to search your own mind and experience, and tell us, quite simply, one or more reasons why, in your opinion, over 110,000 teachers deserted the teaching profession last year, and why every year a smaller percentage of college graduates are choosing teaching as a life work. If you are one of those who have deserted it, give your own experience; if not, give the experience of your friends.

The following are some of the well-known men and women who will act as judges in this contest:

David Starr Jordan, President Emeritus, Leland-Stanford University.

Ada Comstock, President of Radcliffe College.

Livingston Farrand, President of Cornell University.

William McAndrew, Superintendent of Schools, Chicago.

Katharine Lee Bates, Professor of English Literature, Wellesley College; author of "America the Beautiful."

Angelo Patri, Principal of Public School Number 45, New York City; author of "A Schoolmaster in a Great City," etc.

Mrs. A. H. Reeve, President of the National Congress of Parents and Teachers.

Mary McSkimmon, President of the National Education Association.

Mrs. William Brown Meloney, Editor of THE DELINEATOR.

RULES FOR THE CONTEST

Before starting to write, read carefully the following rules, for if your paper does not conform to them it can not be considered for a prize:

1. Manuscripts must not be over one thousand words in length, must be typewritten, and must be on only one side of the paper. They will not be judged on literary merit, but on their sincerity, insight, the conviction they carry, and their constructive suggestions.

2. Manuscripts must bear the name and address of the sender and the statement as to whether or not the sender is a teacher. In case of a tie for any of the prizes each contestant who ties will receive the full amount of the prize tied for.

3. No manuscript will be returned unless accompanied by a stamped and self-addressed envelope.

4. Manuscripts must be addressed to "Prize Contest Editor, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.," and must be received by us on or before January 7, 1926.

5. Prizes will be announced in THE DELINEATOR for June, 1926.

6. Prize-winning papers are the property of THE DELINEATOR. The magazine also reserves the right to purchase, at its regular rates, and to publish any manuscripts submitted in this contest which are not prize-winners.

Big lessons from little Houses

The story of the 1925 Better Homes Campaign

By BLANCHE BRACE

GRANTED that home's the best thing that life has to offer, is the average American home honestly the best place that effort and wisdom and love can make it?

Most readers of THE DELINEATOR already know the details of the successful effort that thousands of citizens in every part of the United States are making to answer "Yes." Banded together as local units of the national organization known as Better Homes in America, men and women, boys and girls, in cities and towns and little villages and lonely rural districts from Mexico to Alaska have dedicated themselves to the task of proving that home's best by making homes better. Why they're doing it, and how, and where, is the story of one of our most promising American adventures in happiness.

TO THE JUNIOR HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS OF PORT HURON, MICHIGAN, WENT A SPECIAL PRIZE FOR THIS SCHOOL PRACTISE HOUSE

This adventure, known as the Better Homes in America Movement, had a small beginning—a chance sentence spoken by the late President Harding in 1921, when he was inspecting a model kitchen open to the public as part of a home-economics demonstration in Toledo, Ohio.

THE WELL-BUDGETED FURNISHING OF THIS HOUSE IN AURORA HILLS, VIRGINIA, WON HONORABLE MENTION

"I'd like to see this sort of thing done in every city in the United States," he said.

"Yes, but why stop with improving just the kitchen?" replied the editor of THE DELINEATOR. "Government reports show that our country is short this year one million homes. Why not start a national campaign to make those homes, when they are built, models of comfort, beauty and convenience—better homes, from which may grow a better home life?" To this idea President Harding gave his hearty support, and the result was the immediate inauguration by Mrs. Meloney of the Better Homes Movement, with the enthusiastic support of the President, Secretary Hoover, the governors of forty-six States, and the principal women's organizations. The first National Better Homes Campaign, with its public demonstration of model homes, gave overwhelming proof that this was a subject close to the heart of the nation; and in two years the movement had spread so amazingly that it was decided, in 1924, to incorporate it as a permanent national educational organization with Herbert Hoover as president, Dr. James Ford as executive director, and President Coolidge as chairman of the advisory council. This advisory council, made up of government officials and representatives of the leading national organizations of women's clubs, welfare and health organizations, and farm and home bureaus of the United States, was a glowing testimony to the fact that "home's best," in the opinion of some of the busiest and most important men and women and civic-minded groups of the nation.

BIRMINGHAM WAS AWARDED A PRIZE BECAUSE OF THE ARCHITECTURAL MERITS OF ITS DEMONSTRATION HOUSE

That's the part of the account that very likely you already know. Now comes the thrilling new chapter that has been added recently to this inspiring human serial of home betterment, the chapter of the 1925 Better Homes Campaign, as a result of which nearly two thousand communities organized demonstrations during National Better Homes Week in May.

PERHAPS the logical place to begin the story of the 1925 Better Homes Campaign is with those two proud and happy communities which tied for the first prize, Atlanta and Santa Barbara.

"We'll hold a demonstration that will aid our citizens of every class, type and color," resolved Atlanta. "And one which will prove that better homes are within the reach of small incomes," added the chairman, Mrs. Newton C. Wing. "And one in which the young people, the home-makers of to-morrow, will take an active part."

This high threefold idea was accomplished in a memorable manner. Atlanta threw open five demonstration centers to the public—

ARE you always proud to show your teeth? Are they free from decay?

Behind your gleaming teeth ' ' no Decay

SAFE ' ' when the salivary glands flow freely

DECAY often hides behind the whitest teeth—behind the most charming smile. And not all the polishing in the world can stop its deadly progress.

It is only recently that dentists and physicians have found a way to fight decay successfully—with nature's own method.

Remedy lies in your own mouth

Nature intended to counteract the acids of decay by the constant flow of your alkaline saliva. But modern, soft, sweet foods do not give your salivary glands enough exercise. Gradually they slow down and leave your teeth unprotected.

The greatest dental authority of modern times says, in "The Prevention of Dental Caries and Oral Sepsis," "A salivary stimulant should be used in order to promote and educate the activity of the salivary glands."

Pebeco is a safe, neutral salivary stimulant. Its effect is accomplished by gently promoting the flow of your natural, alkaline saliva.

FOR your appearance and your health use the toothpaste that increases the protective saliva

As soon as Pebeco enters your mouth the salivary glands flow more freely. Your mouth feels fresher.

With regular daily use Pebeco entirely restores the normal, protective flow of your glands. Their alkaline fluids bathe your teeth day and night and prevent the formation of bacterial plaques or film. The acids of decay are neutralized as fast as they form. Every day your teeth grow cleaner and stronger.

PEBECO does its polishing carefully without using any gritty substance. It keeps your teeth beautifully white, your gums clean and soothed, your whole mouth normal and healthy.

Do not let your teeth deteriorate. Learn to keep them strong and really safe with the toothpaste that restores the protective function of your salivary glands.

How Beauty baffled the Marquis

"Fair lady, surely this will gain thy pleasure," said the Marquis, in a very pleading tone, as he presented his soap treasure, "for it brings the perfumes and colors of Oriental gardens. It is rich with the magic medicaments and nourishing oils of the ancients."

"How very sweet of you, Marquis," replied Beatrice. "And will it keep me beautiful?"

"Forever and ever!"

"I shall use it, then. Thank you. Return ten years from today, at this hour, and if I am still as beautiful as I am this moment, I may marry you."

But when Beatrice learned the truth —that, with all its perfumes and colors and oils and medicaments, his beguiling soap had none of the magic powers he had claimed for it—she grew very doubtful of the Marquis's reliability. So she married the nice young man who offered her a cottage by the sea and unlimited supplies of honest Ivory.

WHAT can a soap truthfully promise you? Magic? Of course not. Take Ivory. If you paid a dollar a cake, you could get no better soap. But if Ivory, with all its excellence, should agree to transform your skin, or cure it, or "nourish" it with oils, that moment it would lay itself open to suspicion, would it not?

Ivory promises no magic. It simply protects the delicate bloom and texture of fine complexions by its purity and mildness. It leaves behind enough of the natural oil to keep your complexion clear and soft.

With Ivory, plus good health, the care of the skin becomes a simple matter.

"CAPTAIN JOHN SMITH HATH NO WIFE, YOUR MAJESTY!" CRIED OUT POCAHONTAS

THANK YOU POCAHONTAS

The immortal love story behind our Country's first Thanksgiving

By HONORÉ WILLSIE MORROW

IT WAS moon-lit, that night of January sixth, 1617. But Pocahontas, sitting in the stern of the barge, observed that there was a ring around the moon. Unless the moon of England differed from that of Virginia, there would be a storm before many hours. With a sigh she wrapped her fur cloak closer about her. The huge Thames river barge, with its canopy and its rugs and cushions, swinging sedately over the wintry waters of this English stream, was vastly more attractive to Pocahontas than her skin-lined canoe on the James River. She told herself that she hoped never again to see either the canoe or the muddy James. Then she sighed once more.

Lady Delaware, sitting opposite the Virginian and watching her with interest, wondered a little about those sighs. Pocahontas seemed superlatively happy over her invitation to visit King James and Queen Anne at the Twelfth-night revels, and she was not a creature of moods. Then why the sighing?

The sophisticated English woman was finding her position as social mentor of the Virginian decidedly the most refreshing that she had held for many years. Moonlight and the yellow rays that fell from the lanthorns etched Pocahontas's young face in outlines of startling beauty. She was dark, yes, but no darker than the wife of the Spanish grandee who was at court that Winter, and far, far lovelier. Her features were of Roman regularity: the same large eyes, with heavily modeled lids, the same full mouth, richly curved, the same round chin and ample throat. And in Pocahontas's face was a tragic sweetness utterly lacking in the Spanish grand dame's haughty features.

Suddenly Lady Delaware leaned forward. "Art sighing for home, princess?"

Pocahontas's dark eyes turned to the keen blue ones opposite. "Nay, Lady Delaware! Indeed I am not! Could I be so unmannerly, with all the kindness shown me here?"

"Sighing for Virginia!" exclaimed a man's hearty voice from behind Lady Delaware, "with husband and babe at hand, and faithful friends! How could that be?"

Lady Delaware, without turning her head, beckoned over her shoulder. "Prithee come forward, Captain Smith, where I may see thee."

A powerfully built man of about thirty-eight moved round to seat himself beside Pocahontas. His gray-blue eyes twinkled in the lanthorn light, and he smoothed his carefully trimmed brown beard with a well-gloved hand.

"You see an adventurer transformed into a courtier, my lady, and all for the sake of our Virginia princess here!"

"She hath done the work not ill, then, hath she, my lord?" cried Lady Delaware to her husband, who sat beside her: a silent man, with gracious, tired lines about his eyes.

"She doth nothing ill, our Pocahontas," replied Lord Delaware. "'Tis a shame that Master Rolfe was too unwell to come to-night. I hear that the king is fast in bed with gout, so he and Master Rolfe must be content to permit their consorts to meet, without their presence."

Pocahontas looked from one to the other. She had acquired English speech and manner with almost unbelievable completeness, and had taken an intense pleasure in doing so. But to-night she found the polite utterances of her companions utterly distasteful to her. She went back to Lady Delaware's question and suddenly resolved to speak truth.

"I long for home," she said, "but not for Virginia nor the muddy James. I sicken with longing for England. My husband hath told me—this afternoon it was—that in March we sail for the New World. And I told him"—Pocahontas leaned forward so that her fathomless black eyes looked full into Lady Delaware's—"I told him that, as for me, I'd remain in England forever."

"And what said Master Rolfe?" cried Lady Delaware.

"He did not deign a reply," replied Pocahontas.

"Mayhap he feared to reply!" exclaimed Lord Delaware with a smile. "Husbands sometimes are afraid! Prithee, tell us why you have so great a love for England?"

"Land ho!" cried Captain Smith suddenly. "Yonder are the lights of Lambeth Palace! In a moment we shall sight Whitehall."

"You are not on shipboard, Captain Smith!" said Lady Delaware icily. "You have interrupted the princess with strange lack of grace."

Smith turned quickly to Pocahontas. "I crave your pardon, princess! None knows better than you that my life hath not been such as makes for courtly manners."

Pocahontas looked up into his grave face wistfully. "I have no fault to find with your manners, dear captain."

"We are turning to the Whitehall Landing," said Lord Delaware quietly.

The barge was coming up slowly to a pier on which stood two men holding torches. A third man caught the rope tossed him by the steersman and in a moment the four passengers, muffled in their cloaks against the bitter night air, were following one of the linkmen toward the brightly lighted doorway of Whitehall Palace. They passed an armored guard at either doorpost and were received by a group of bowing lackeys in satin liveries. One of these who seemed to Pocahontas to be the tallest man she had seen in England informed the newly arrived guests that Lord and Lady Delaware were to come at once to the queen, but that the Princess Pocahontas and Captain Smith were to wait in a little retiring-room at one side of the great hall.

THUS, unexpectedly, Pocahontas achieved her heart's desire. She was alone with John Smith.

In the tiny room they cast aside their cloaks and for a moment stood staring. Pocahontas wore a dress of red velvet shot with gold. Above the low-cut bodice rose an exquisite ruff of point lace, and her skirt, distended by a huge farthingale, was draped with gold tissue.

"Thou art more splendid than the queen herself!" cried John.

"And thou wilt outshine the king!" Pocahontas retorted with a little laugh.

The captain was indeed a splendid figure. Tall, well built, supple in every line, he looked younger than his thirty-eight years. His doublet and short breeches were of white satin, his trunk hose of pink silk and his short cape of pink velvet, held by a jeweled brooch.

Pocahontas's eyes, as she stared, suddenly filled with tears. "John, John!" she cried with a great sob. "Don't let them send me away from thee! Let me abide in London!"

The young man tossed his plumed cap to the table and flung out his hands with a despairing gesture. "How can I prevent it, sweetheart? Thou'rt not my wife!"

Pocahontas ran to him and clasped both his brown hands against her heart. "Why did you sail away from Jamestown, ten long years ago, and never return to marry me? You promised me?"

John looked down pitifully into the tragic eyes so close to his. "But, sweet, half a hundred times I've answered that, since thou reached England."

"Nay, always the answer hath put me off! Tell me the truth now, John."

"Truth, then!" ejaculated the captain. "How could I know thou wouldst grow into a great princess? I left thee a naked child of twelve, turning handsprings with the lads in the public square of Jamestown. Thou wert but a wild maid, though a very sweet and gentle one."

"But thou always said," urged Pocahontas, "that thy life was mine, because that I had saved it from Powhatan, and that thou wouldst come back and marry me!"

"But as one may always speak to a pretty maid—and thou wert a dear pretty maid, as wild and as gentle as a doe. O Pocahontas, why did I not foresee this?" John's voice broke. He pressed his lips against Pocahontas's hand, then suddenly lifted his head. "But thou didst not wait for me!"

"They told me thou wast dead!" exclaimed Pocahontas. "They have told me many lies. This was the worst. Let me stay with thee, John!"

Captain Smith had faced all the terrible mischances of an explorer's life without fear. But he gazed at the beautiful Virginian aghast.

Pocahontas caught his look and wrung her hands. "But thou lovest me, John, dost thou not?"

"God help me!" ejaculated the captain. "But He knows I do love thee with all my heart. When I saw thee last Summer, for the first time in ten years, all that great love I'd had for the child Pocahontas blossomed full-blown into the love of a man for a woman. God help us both, dear Pocahontas!"

"Kiss me!" she whispered, lifting her face to his. John swept her into his arms and pressed his lips to hers.

In the meantime, Lady Delaware was being catechized by Queen Anne. The two women were almost as isolated on the dais at the end of the crowded banqueting hall as were the lovers in the anteroom, for none dared to approach within earshot, and the beautiful room itself was so huge that, though it was thronged with Twelfth-night revelers who had come to see Ben Jonson present his Christmas mask, the sounds of revelry heard from the dais were remote and unimportant.

The queen, seated in a huge gilt chair, was a handsome, brown-eyed woman, splendid in green velvet and many jewels.

"But prithee," she said impatiently to Lady Delaware, after she had received Lord Delaware's greetings and had sent him to dance with a pretty lady-in-waiting, "prithee, why am I to be pestered by this Indian princess and this madman adventurer, Smith?"

"Your Majesty hath read Captain Smith's letter?"

"I SOLD MY SOUL TO THE DEVIL WHEN I WAS A KID, JANEY," CAPTAIN RALEIGH LAUGHED, "AND THERE'S NO SECRETS OF HIS I DON'T KNOW"

Beginning a novel of restless youth

BEAUTY and the BEAST

By KATHLEEN NORRIS

Author of "Mother," "Rose of the World," etc.

The story of a girl who could buy what she wanted

"IT'S not at all bad, you know, really," the Englishman's voice conceded amusedly. "I say—" he added, as Janey Davenport emerged from her cabin, as fresh and bright and sparkling as the fresh, bright, sparkling March morning itself. "We're sayin' that it's not half bad, eh what?" he repeated. A jerk of his big tweed shoulder indicated the dreaming green sweetness of the shore and the old city asleep in the sunshine between the sharp teeth of the mountains.

Janey, with a laughing nod that extended a morning greeting to the three young men who had been standing together on the shining deck, went to the rail, hung there for a brief moment staring straight ahead of her, and turned again to them, beaming.

"It's—divine!" she said in a hushed voice. "But then, I knew Sicily would be," Janey added enthusiastically. "Gordon," she said with childish pleasantness to the young captain of the trim yacht Dixie Belle, "you're smart, do you know it? A few days ago we were in all the darkness and smokiness of Southampton—last night we all thought we were going to the bottom—and now look at us. Off the coast of Sicily. I don't know how you do it."

"I sold my soul to the devil when I was a kid, Janey," the captain laughed, "and there's no secrets of his I don't know."

The Englishman chuckled appreciatively. He and the American stood shoulder to shoulder, both tall, well-built men, the family tie that laughed at a mere hundred and fifty years was constantly to be seen between them, although Thomas Richard Arthur Macarthur, Lord Rountrey, was a strictly English product, and Gordon Raleigh's ancestors had come to America with the little group of English aristocrats who settled in the South in the seventeenth century. Lord Rountrey was large-boned, muscular, his blue eyes blazing in a weather-bronzed, long-cheeked face, his teeth big and white, his tawny hair receding a little at the temples, though he was but two or three and thirty. He had the Englishman's charming voice, he played the piano, talked books, golf, bridge, opera, dogs and horses with equal enthusiasm, he had been everywhere, and wore a decoration and a scar from the great war. Janey hardly knew whether to be annoyed or impressed with his easy authority upon such subjects as interested him and his complete indifference to those that did not.

His knowledge of ships and the sea was, at all events, satisfying. A navy man, he loved to talk of harbors and voyages, storms and wrecks, ship secrets and sea mysteries. Gordon Raleigh, whose love for the green trackless water lay like some hidden passion under his casual and cheerful life, Janey noted, had quite taken Lord Rountrey to his heart.

CAPTAIN RALEIGH, master of Janey's beautiful yacht, the Dixie Belle, was exactly two years her senior—and so in his twenty-ninth year. They had been friends as children. Their mothers, their grandmothers had been friends, back beyond the days of the World War, the Spanish War, the Civil War, the Revolution. And, when Janey and Gordon had been small children, sometimes their mothers, watching them play together, had dreamed of still another tie among all the many that knitted the two houses.

"Johnnie-Belle, they certainly do think the world and all of each other."

"Wouldn't it be just too lovely, Hattie-Lou?"

But that was over twelve years ago. Twelve years ago when the girl was fourteen Janey's mother had died, and an old uncle of her dead father had grudgingly put Janey in a convent school, grudgingly paid for uniforms and music lessons. Three years later, when he died, Janey had suddenly found herself an heiress. The old man had lived on less than a thousand a year. Janey's income was more than that every week.

So Gordon did not think any more about Janey except as an inaccessible and beautiful person, never to be his, but always to be guarded and watched faithfully as by a brother. And presently, when Janey wanted a yacht of her own, and her uncle and guardian, a retired navy man, had approved, Gordon had helped design the little schooner, her picturesque sails augmented by a prosaic auxiliary engine, and had found himself spending less and less time in a languishing law business and more and more in the shipyards. Janey's final plea— "Ah, Gordy—come on, we're going to China and Norway and Hawaii and everywhere on her—come on, be a sport. Be her captain just for a year, Gordy, and then you can turn her over to somebody else!"—had found him strangely weak. He had been but twenty-seven after all, and deep down in his heart he believed that he loved her.

Janey had believed it, too. The daughter of a long line of flirts and beauties, she had liked the situation. Gordy, stunning in his white uniform and vizored cap, would see her adored, supreme, beseiged by earls and counts, wearing the most ravishing clothes——

And so, with Aunt Nell and Uncle Joe Stanley and Kitty Winship, who was, after Janey, the prettiest girl in the South, and Robbie Wilson, they had sailed through the blue waters of the Canal, and up to San Francisco harbor, and down to Honolulu's beaches, and to China, where they had picked up Major William Quentin George Fox Macarthur, and where Robbie had left them, to rush home.

Everywhere there had been men, excitement, laughter, dancing—it had all been a thousand times nicer than the dream. But when they had reached London, Kitty had quite stubbornly and suddenly married Major William Quentin George Fox Macarthur, and they were already settled down in Surrey—"exactly like a Wells novel," Janey said. Lord Rountrey was Major Macarthur's older brother.

THE marriage had sobered Janey Davenport a little. Kitty was but twenty-four, Janey two years older. Kitty was pretty and she had had a neat little fortune of her own, but she had had nothing like Janey's bellehood. Janey had been sobered by Kitty's sweetness over her love-affair, her devotion to her young, rosy-faced husband, her content in settling down.

"I begin to be afraid I'll never feel it—the real thing, Kit," Janey had said gravely a few weeks after the wedding.

The young wife, wrapped in a glamour of radiance and bewilderment, had conceded her only an absent-minded smile.

"Of course you will, Janey." The father- and mother-in-law were coming in to dine with them to-night. Kitty would wear the daffodil tulle, with the big appliqué pansies——

Janey had reminded herself a little discontentedly that she still had the yacht—they were going down to Sicily. And wasn't it fun that Lord Rountrey and Comte Lebretagne were coming, too? The latter, indeed, had some business reason for going. They would have, said Janey for the thousandth time on this trip, "the time of their lives."

Yet she had felt oddly flat saying it. Kitty, left to her Billy and to the inspection of her Billy's imposing parents, Lord and Lady Bankbrooks, seemed oddly fortunate to Janey.

Somebody cared what frock Kitty wore now. Kitty was never alone now. Kitty was of supreme importance, and not only to herself!

Janey had experienced a time of panic. She, Janey, was twenty-six, and although almost all the men she met who were comparatively free made love to her, somehow they didn't strike answering sparks. Hitherto she had felt that this was entirely the fault of her admirers—let him win her who might!

But now misgivings seized her for the first time in ten years, and she began nervously to analyze her feelings toward various men who stood high in her friendship, and especially to the three who were her shipmates: Gordon Raleigh, Lord Rountrey, and Elie, Comte Lebretagne.

Lebretagne, between the two larger men who outmeasured him by half a head apiece, was nevertheless by far the best looking of the three. His was the Latin beauty of olive skin, fine black eyes, sleek black hair swept straight back from a sensitive brow. If Janey felt that back of Lord Rountrey lay a thousand years of gentle blood, she knew that Elie Lebretagne could claim something more—a thousand years of actual nobility.

Behind the Paris world of shops and fashions and amusements, Elie's family still lived unchanged their dim and dreaming life, a life supremely dignified, supremely satisfying. Janey had caught only tantalizing glimpses of that life. Respectful, a little awed, she had been taken by Elie to have tea with his aunt—and again with his mother. Old mirrors, old servants, old odorous carpets, old jangling bells, had environed the tea-parties. Eyes, all gentle, all friendly, had inspected her.

Later she had driven down through the apple-greenness of Spring to spend an afternoon with his married sister, in the country near Fontainebleau. The little vicomtesse had been expecting her fifth child. The vicomte, interested in turkeys and fertilizers, had limped on a wooden leg. The château had been sadly shabby. Marrying Elie—and Elie must marry a rich woman, must marry an American ("pauvr' enfant!") as one of his aunts had said quite frankly—marrying Elie, Janey would live in just such a château, and have her Paris apartment, too. And when she went back to America for a visit with her children she would be "the Countess."

"It would be lots of fun to fix up the old château!" Janey, musing on these things, said to Gordon Raleigh.

"Don't you ever think of anything but fun, Janey?" Gordon had asked curiously. And Janey, although she had returned joyfully, "No, and I never mean to!" had felt a little afraid. Was it true, didn't she ever think of anything but fun? And if she didn't, was that a fault?

Well, anyway, here they were this glorious March morning off Palermo, and all thoughts of a serious nature were immediately banished by the delicious prospect of new sensations, explorations, adventures, by the heavenly sunshine that was streaming over the bay and the mountains and the city, warming the travelers on the Dixie Belle to the marrow of their storm-chilled bones.

They had anchored a short half-mile from shore. The city lay to the southeast, and before them, bright and beautiful in the sunshine, the rising towers and wide porches of the famous hotel, the beautiful Villa Igiea.

"I suppose we're waiting for something, Gordon?" Janey asked. "Have we run up the Jolly Roger, or whatever it is that makes them come out and admit that we haven't leprosy on board?"

"Reluctantly," added Lord Rountrey, with his short appreciative bark of laughter.

THEY hung on the rail together sociably, all four of them, gazing fascinated at the irregular line of the long water-front, the busy trafficking on the water, the corresponding movement on shore.

Behind it all rose the sharp silhouette of the volcanic mountains, with tiny orchards and vineyards catching a foothold on their slopes, and the long walls of villa sites, with mellowed roofs breaking through the low foliage. Church bells, ringing for the midday angelus, laced the sweet, sunshiny air with exquisite gay discords, the shadows lay deeply blue on the whiteness and beauty of the Dixie Belle.

"Tell Bates we'll have lunch on board, darn it," Janey said then tragically. "It'll be dark before we go ashore at this rate! And you might ask—" she was adding to the deckhand who was about to depart with her commission when a middle-aged man and woman, impeccable in white clothes, came out from the cabin and she interrupted herself, "Ah, here they are. No matter," she said, going toward them with a greeting. "Good morning—ecco Palermo!" she said gaily, with kisses for them both.

"Janey, it just isn't noon already," the woman said, in a sort of good-natured wail. Stout, handsome at sixty, Mrs. Stanley appealed to the smiling circle of young men.

"But we didn't go to bed until after three, Aunt Nell!" Janey reminded her. "We all slept late! And considering that at this time yesterday we all honestly thought we'd sleep our last, long sleep before morning, I think we've done well to get up at all."

"What time did the storm blow herself out really?" old Captain Stanley asked the captain of the Dixie Belle. Young Raleigh laughed.

"She was just about done when you-all turned in, sir. I wasn't up half an hour after that. But she rode it all like a gull!" Gordon Raleigh, with a lover's glance upward and about his ship, said quietly.

"One wasn't quite ashamed of her, jolly old girl," the Englishman murmured in confirmation. And Janey laid her bright head against a stanchion and touched her soft cheek to the white wood.

"Ah, she's a darling, the Dixie Belle!" she said lovingly.

SHE looked a darling herself, so standing, in all the brightness of Spring and sunshine and whitened decks and blue water. Young and firm and sweet, brown-eyed, buttoned trimly into the smartest of little loose sports frocks, and with a rosetted white hat drawn down over bright chestnut hair, white-shod, her slim ankles visible through the faint mesh of white silk stockings, her whole being radiated the happiness that was making life for her a long, enchanting game.

The five others laughed at her affectionately, and Janey, looking at the three young men, felt a quite unexpected little twist at her heart. Since Kitty's marriage a month ago everything had seemed different, somehow. Was it Kitty's happiness? Or was it the addition of Lord Rountrey to the party? Or had it been meeting Comte Lebretagne in Paris and annexing him, too? Or was it just Spring and Palermo and being twenty-six, when, if ever, one should think seriously of marriage?

Certainly it wasn't Gordon Raleigh. Janey was beginning to suspect that he didn't even like her. He no longer was easy, confidential, big-brotherly with her in the old way.

He liked Lord Rountrey, they had even begun to call each other "Tom" and "Gordon"—it wasn't that. And if he didn't like Elie Lebretagne—well, then why had he been so eager to

CHRISTMAS GIFTS WE HAVE FOR YOU

THE DELINEATOR will come to you next month filled to the brim with holiday treasures. "No fair peeping" is the old-time household rule while preparations for the great day are in progress. But we know how strong is the urge to catch a glimpse of the good things in store for you. So we are creating a new Christmas custom—a peep-hole into our forthcoming holiday issue. Here is just a hint of the presents we are preparing for your pleasure, and the rich suggestions for your giving pleasure to others that will make everything this year on your Christmas list easy and original and welcome.

CHRISTMAS FICTION:

Ellis Parker Butler, never-forgotten author of "Pigs Is Pigs," has written something else that will be as long remembered. The fate of the illegitimate child has captured his heart—and from his heart he gives us a great Christmas story entitled "Where Is My Father?"

Zona Gale writes another Christmas story, but in madder holiday mood. In it elopements are brewing and the dead coming to life again!

Dixie Willson, of "Little Texas" fame, has a gorgeous Christmas present for DELINEATOR readers—"Moon-Rose," a royal love-story, telling of Madlon, an innkeeper's daughter, and her strange part in the destiny of the Mad King of Bavaria and immortal Richard Wagner.

Kathleen Norris also continues to captivate—while her heroine Janey Davenport has capture and a thousand other dangers in store for her in the wild mountains of Sicily.

CHRISTMAS ARTICLES:

"High Days and Holidays with Kate Douglas Wiggin" is the title of a December article by Roderick Stebbins, who is an old friend of this beloved American author. He will take you straight to Sunnybrook Farm (and where could be a better place to spend Christmas, we ask you?) with this gay and friendly woman who actually lived as joyously as the books with which she cheered the world.

"The Miracle Play Comes Back." The greatest authority on pageantry in this country, Constance D'Arcy MacKay, will tell you every practical detail in reviving this beautiful custom in your community.

CHRISTMAS GIFTS:

Gifts for the house and gifts for everybody in the house. Trust Mrs. Charles Bradley Sanders to provide ideas a-plenty and the ways and means of making them, besides.

Something new in Christmas cards—silhouettes—of you or your children or your dog or your house. Novel and personal. They may be made at home at small cost. THE DELINEATOR tells you how next month.

CHRISTMAS FEASTS:

"The Irresistible Three—Dinner—Dickens—Christmas"—has menus to make Mr. Pickwick himself expand. Here are suggestions for a jovial dinner-party that will be remembered for all time.

CHRISTMAS BEAUTY:

"Follow the Star"—Celia Caroline Cole points the way to lasting loveliness.

PUNCTUALLY WITH THE TEA-THINGS APPEARED THE YOUNG ITALIAN NOBLEMEN. DOLLY SATERLEE PRESENTED THEM TO JANEY WITH AN AIR OF PROPRIETORSHIP THAT SECRETLY AMUSED HER make this Sicilian trip? Elie had been the reason for their coming to Sicily; he had some small business there. And it had been Gordon, who—hearing of this at a wild, happy luncheon when Kitty and her new husband and Lord Rountrey and Elie and Janey and Aunt Nell and Uncle Stan had all met in Paris at the Café de Paris—Gordon, who had said: "Why not take the Dixie Belle down there?"

Janey told herself that she didn't care a rap what Gordon Raleigh thought about her. Nobody was going to marry Gordon Raleigh, anyway!

"Oh, dear! I want to go on shore!" she murmured perversely, childishly, lingering at the rail when the summons to luncheon had come. "I have a funny feeling about Sicily, Lord Rountrey," Janey added as he and she, slowly following the others to the cabin, were somewhat separated from them, "a feeling that something—something strange is going to happen here. Do you ever have those feelings?"

"I—I don't imagine I'm much of a chap at that sort of thing, no," the man answered.

"You wouldn't let it make you—nervous?" demanded Janey.

"Oh, jolly well rather not," he ejaculated simply.

"I feel—curiously—that I've come to a turning of the ways," the girl pursued seriously. "I think my uncle and aunt would like awfully to have me marry," she added, looking straight into his eyes, and quite without embarrassment, "and I feel as if, in a way, I ought to marry. Kitty's marrying, maybe, was what made me consider it first. Anyway, I've been thinking a lot about it."

"I should suppose—being so pretty and sweet and all that—you'd have been thinkin' of nothing else for years!" the Englishman suggested bluntly. "My sister Madge, now, and my older sister, who lives in India, they jolly well had it on their minds, if you ask me, from the time they put their hair up."

"Well, perhaps I have, too," Janey admitted, "and am just realizing it."

"I wish awfully—one feels a fool saying it, and of course there's a lot about the money and all that—" Lord Rountrey began fumblingly. He screwed in the monocle he wore so easily, cleared his throat. "There's no use assumin' that there aren't bills, and repairs, and what not," he said. "I shall have to live down there—in a way I belong to the place as much as it belongs to me—Bankbrook, I mean, and King's Easy, and that sort of thing——

"The war came along before I was out of Oxford," he resumed after a pause. "That was all right, of course, although it wasn't quite the sort of a tea-party that puts a fellow on his legs. The governor was quite wiped out—taxes, assessments, and all, seventeen shillin' to the pound—all right, that's all in the day's work, too. The mater was keen for me to marry Vi Parsons—a dear little thing, Red Cross apron and all that—their property touches ours on two sides; Vi'll have it. It would have been quite all right for me to say to Vi, 'Look here, old dear, I'm broke, d'you see? I've got to stick to the governor, he's all done for, I've got to hold the family and the name together. You've got enough for two—what about it?'

"What I'm trying to say," he added, more easily than he had yet spoken, as Janey continued to regard him with serious brown eyes in a flushed and unsmiling young face, "is that I could say it to Vi, she's a neighbor—she's one of us, and she understands. But I quite can't say it to you, Janey."

"On account of my money?" Janey at the cabin door said very low.

"On account of your money. Dash it, I like it," Lord Rountrey said frankly, "one's got to have some of it, anyway, unless one wants to go in for soap or pork. But you've got too bally much."

Janey laughed. Sixteen seconds later she was attacking chicken with apparent gusto. But she was shaken.

He was nice, Tom. She already called him Tom in her heart. She and darling Kitty Winship would be sisters-in-law—it might be "fun!" Some day she would be Lady Bankbrooks, and her oldest boy would be Lord Rountrey. Kitty's children, of course, wouldn't have titles, unless she, Janey, didn't have a son.

THERE was something extremely annoying about that imperative necessity to bear sons. Pauline Rossiter, who had gone to school with Janey, had married an Englishman of title, and had born six girls in a row before the indispensable son had come. The new boy was about a month old now. Janey had had a peep at him and the exhausted Pauline before she had left London. Agatha, Audrey, Charlotte, Dolly, Christine and Marjorie—nice little straight-haired blonde girls in smocks. And now Geoffrey George Peter, whose coming meant that they had a home over their little heads. Pauline had seven children at twenty-eight.

It was silly! Suppose a girl married Lord Rountrey, for example, how flat she would feel, bearing a daughter! How inadequate, bearing a second daughter!

In France it was different. Titles were not so jealously watched there. In the first place, money was all-important; and in the second, as the government completely denied the claims of the old nobility, it really didn't matter anyway. Comtes, vicomtes and marquises flourished on every branch of every family tree, and the directories held pages and pages upon which every other name was a title. No titled Frenchman felt any shame in his open desire for a profitable marriage; balanced alliances were the custom of the country, and Comte Lebretagne had made them laugh with his frank allusion to his own poverty and the need of a rich wife.

"I can not open hotels or hat shops," he had said,

MORAL LAXITY OR MORAL LAW?

By HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK

THIS message for Thanksgiving Day is being written on the Maine coast. Here at Popham Beach, an inviting stretch of sand pounded by rollers from the open ocean and backed by evergreen woods, some merchant adventurers from England long ago dared an enterprise of which most Americans have never heard.

In 1607, thirteen years before the Mayflower sailed, they came to make a settlement. On one of these neighboring islands they held the first Protestant service of worship in the Americas north of Jamestown, Virginia. And here, where Summer cottages now abound, they built a fort, fifty houses, a church and a storehouse. The first Winter was terrific. Death took their leader. Depleted and discouraged, when Spring came they threw up the fight against inclemency and loneliness. "They all ymbarqued," says the record, ". . . And this was the end of that northerne colony upon the river Sachadeboc."

Popham Beach helps to throw light on Plymouth Rock and Massachusetts Bay. It was after such perils, sufferings, hair-breadth escapes as this strip of sand once witnessed that the Pilgrims and Puritans came to try again the inhospitable wilderness. As one sits here where brave men once were beaten by the rigors of a New England Winter and the loneliness of an untamed wilderness, one estimates afresh the courage and self-discipline which dared the impossible once more and carried it through to victory.

What is the characteristic difference in moral tone between those rugged conquerors of a continent and ourselves? Differences of ethical code are to be taken for granted, for times change and "new occasions teach new duties"; but a difference in moral tone is fundamentally important. Moral tone is to a man or a generation what temper is to steel, and the quality must have been excellent in those men and women who on the first Thanksgiving Day lifted their psalms to wintry skies.

Self-discipline versus self-expression—is not that the contrast which at once suggests itself as we step from their days into ours? The statement is not altogether fair, either to them or to ourselves, for they also expressed themselves in creativeness and joy, and we are too close to the World War to doubt the capacities for self-discipline in modern character. But the two words do suggest a significant contrast in moral tone between the hardy adventurers who made America and the new generation that to-day inhabits it.

SELF-EXPRESSION is a catchword of the present day. Dean Hawkes of Columbia University, after reviewing the characteristic attitudes of the newer generation, says: "So far as I can see, all of these facts have their root in the desire of the individual of to-day to express himself." In wide areas of our education processes are afoot which a university president recently characterized as appealing to an infant that he give expression to himself. And portions of our moral life glaringly exhibit the new doctrine that the chief end of man is to let himself go.

Probably this phase of thought and experience is inevitable. Human life, like the climate, is seasonal. Winter comes, when institutions, creeds, manners and morals congeal into stiff and rigid patterns. Then a thaw is due when these frozen forms of life lose their rigidity, become plastic, pliable, fluid, until Spring freshets tear down through the river beds and mud clogs up the roads. In such a springtime thaw of mental and moral life we now find ourselves. Behind us was the mid-Victorian era when poetry was written in perfect rhythm, when manners were precise and regular, when morals were well defined and settled. After such a congealing of life a springtime thaw was inevitable. It is on us now. The mood of this generation is not restraint but release. We are in rebellion against conventionality, conformity, authority. We want to get ourselves expressed. We are all for letting ourselves go. As a result, in poetry we have free verse, in music jazz, in art cubism, in morals "Do as you please."

Not by any means is this all deplorable. It may turn out to be creative, exploring new areas of life that a stiff formalism never could have found. In particular, we well may be thankful for the candor, the independence, the self-reliance, the freedom from cant and hypocrisy, the adventurousness and daring that characterize the best of the new generation. Nevertheless, on Thanksgiving Day it is worth our while to chasten the faulty extravagance of an unbalanced self-expression by the complementary ideal of self-discipline for which our forefathers so memorably stood.

The basic fact under the whole matter is that the interior world which we call moral is just as law-abiding as the external world that we call physical. The lesson of an orderly world where the only road to achievement lies in learning the laws and fulfilling the conditions has been fairly well mastered with regard to the outer universe. No scientist expects to arrive anywhere by traveling loosely down a broad and lawless road. No scientist expects to achieve anything by letting himself go.

In 1878, in New York University, Professor John Draper, one of the leading physicists of that day, amused his class by exploding Leyden jars. Said he: "This new force of electricity is very interesting. Many ingenious experiments can be performed with it, but it has no future; it never will be commercially profitable." To-day, however, harnesssed electricity has us habitually on tiptoe wondering what new thing will be done with it tomorrow. Only, lawlessness has not accomplished that. Nothing except learning the laws and fulfilling the conditions achieves such results.

This lesson, well mastered with regard to the world without, has been but poorly learned with reference to the world within. Yet it is just as true there, and the recognition of this fact is one of the outstanding needs as it is already one of the most profound influences in the present generation.

RELIGION must take more account of this fact than it has ever done. Many of us were trained in a religion of magic, where we were taught to trust God in general to see us through somehow or other. But we would not trust God to give us electric lights without fulfilling the conditions. No more can we trust God to give us a radiant, triumphant inner life unless we learn the laws of the spiritual world and observe them. There is no magic in true religion. Prayer is not magic; it is fulfilling conditions of spiritual communion and getting results. The forgiveness of sin and the building of a fine character are not magic. Fellowship with God is as law-abiding as tuning in on the radio. It is personal, not mechanical, and therefore not to be formulated in mathematics, but the conditions are there to be fulfilled.

Education must take this lesson increasingly into account. In revolt against the old dogmatic pedagogy, where little children were made the mere recipients of authoritative teaching, many parents have swung to the opposite extreme. They are letting their children go. They are so worried about teaching them dogmatically that they teach them nothing—not even manners, not even controlled temper, not even ordinary honesty, much less the fine attitude of reverence or the fine art of prayer. Such looseness is not simply immoral; it is unscientific. Nobody in any other realm expects to arrive anywhere by such haphazard, slipshod methods. The way out is not back into the old dogmatism; the way out is forward into a clearer grasp of the laws of a child's development, and a careful, obedient, controlled observance of them.

That this basic fact—the law-abiding nature of the inner world—affects the modern doctrine of letting oneself go in the realm of morals is obvious. On every side inviting voices summon the new generation to moral looseness. It is part of the temper of the time. "Let yourself go!" the voices say. "Snap your fingers at the white-haired traditions called moral. They are bogies to scare children with; they are fetishes which the superstitious worship. Unharness from yourself the restraints which prudishness has fastened on you. Assert your liberty. Let yourself go!"

Multitudes are thinking that. Multitudes are living that in circles where a little while ago it would have seemed incredible. And, because we desire intellectual backing for the conduct of our lives, we bring to our support the new psycho-analytical psychology and say: "We must not repress vital instincts; it is dangerous to do that; we may have complexes if we do."

THE trouble with this attitude is not simply moral, but factual. Life is not built on the basis which this attitude presupposes. Tradition or no tradition, letting oneself go is no law of life in any realm. Applied constantly to sex, this loose and lawless idea of the proper use of primitive instincts is revealed for what it is when it is applied to an instinct like fear. We all have that. It is part of the primitive equipment of mankind. The sudden flush of fright, the ability to run with supernormal speed, were necessary to the preservation of the race. Suppose, now, a man in the front-line trenches, when the bombardment starts and the primitive fear instinct becomes energetically self-assertive—if he deserts his post and runs, how will he explain the matter to the court-martial? Will he say, "I am a disciple of the new psychology; it is dangerous to repress vital instincts; complexes follow that; I dared not restrain my fear and so I ran?" No such excuse will save him from his penalty.

The instinct of pugnacity also is in us all. It has been necessary to the existence of the race. The capacity for swift anger, the power to strike with stimulated strength, are born with us. If, now, in a subway rush, mauled, stepped on, walked all over, our pugnacious instinct becomes vehemently active and we do what we feel like doing, how shall we explain the matter to the judge? Obviously it will not be to plead the new psychology. It will not do to assure his Honor that vital instincts are given us to express and not restrain.

Indeed, not only is this loose view of life in terms of self-expression not good morals nor good law, it is not good psychology. It is only a caricature of the new psychology, which some men use who are looking desperately for an excuse. What the new psychology really teaches is that primitive instincts, difficult and dangerous as they are to handle, can be sublimated, harnessed, organized around high aims, and human personality be unified, satisfied, purposeful and happy.

What does this new generation want? It wants freedom. It hates the lock-step of compelled uniformity. In that we should all support it. But there is one thing from

LEAP FROG

And James Appleton Martin, Junior, saw to it that he did

By WALTER TRUMBULL

THERE was as yet in the bright lexicon of James Appleton Martin no such word as "vocabulary." Had there been he would have asserted that as applied to grown persons it contained but two words. One of them was "Don't." The other "Stop."

Apple—thus familiarly known to distinguish him from his father, who was also James Appleton Martin—would have told you that in the nine years of his life he had heard them a million times. His conservatism as to count was, of course, influenced by the fact that a million was the largest number he knew. This very Sunday morning had added considerably to the total. For example, there was the matter of the goldfish. The goldfish were enclosed in a bowl where they spent most of their time either hiding under some tangled green stuff or sticking their noses against the glass and working their mouths in a manner that corresponded to making faces. Apple knew that this in itself was reprehensible. Many a time he had been told to stop making faces. Giving the matter his attention it gradually developed that the bowl could be turned into a very fair race-course—about two thousand laps to the mile—and, with the aid of a war relic in the shape of a knitting-needle, the fish could be induced to proceed around it at exciting speed. Unfortunately, just as one contestant seemed on the point of turning the sprint into a steeplechase by hurdling some green sprigs, the reform party arrived in the person of Apple's mother.

"Appleton! Stop!" she said. "Stop that this minute."

The use of the unabbreviated name, as well as the tone, indicated the subject was closed to debate. "Don't ever do that again. Mother is surprised that her son should be cruel to poor, dumb, little goldfish."

Apple, too, was surprised. He wasn't being cruel to anything. As a matter of justice it may be said that he had been careful not to prod the fish with the point of the needle. He merely had flipped them slightly when they showed signs of pulling up. But they undoubtedly were dumb. That was a word he knew. They were the dumbest fish he had ever encountered. And they were lazy. Needing exercise as they did, what could be better for them than a brisk morning work-out? Their whole day would be brighter for it. But it was useless to argue. The track was closed permanently.

CRASH WENT THE CITRONELLA FROM APPLE'S EAGER HANDS. NO MOSQUITO BORN OF LARVA WOULD HAVE BEEN BOLD ENOUGH TO ANNOY AUNT ETTA THEN

FROM a corner of the couch Apple gave himself over to reflection. Since coming to this house in the country, Sunday had usually been a most enjoyable day. On other days his father left early for the city and returned, tired, just in time for dinner. Sundays he was home and, moreover, was willing to take walks or read aloud or play games. Things were cheery. But this Sunday, although outside the sun beat down glitteringly, was wrapped in an atmosphere of gloom. Apple thought that he knew why. Aunt Etta was coming.

A visit from Aunt Etta never was a blithe occasion. Somehow it had conveyed to Apple that it was his duty to love his aunt. He did not see how anybody could possibly find it a pleasure. Could he have remolded the scheme of things, Aunt Etta would have been left out—or, at least, no relation. Then he could have thought of her in any way he liked without a sense of guilt. Darned if he could see why the family made such a fuss over her. They always were crabby enough just before she came. Instead of showing any desire to entertain, there sat his father reading a newspaper. Apple rose to stand behind him.

There didn't appear to be anything interesting on that page of the paper, not even a picture. Placing his hands on the back of the chair Apple gently rocked back and forth.

"Don't do that," said Mr. Martin sharply.

THINGS certainly were not going right this morning. Returning to the couch Apple glanced toward his mother. Seated at a desk she seemed to be adding a column of figures. Certainly it was queer that any one should spend such a day doing arithmetic—a thing sure to bring discomfort to whoever attempted it. No wonder his mother's face had a troubled look!

Having spent one full minute in absolute repose, Apple turned sideways and extended a leg. There was a book on the couch and after considerable effort he worked the toe of his shoe under it. Aimlessly he raised the book and lowered it. This was a queer world of little understanding. Withdrawing his support from the book he pushed it from him with a flirt of his ankle. There was no animus behind the push. It was merely a gesture of protest against things in general, but the couch was covered with chintz, a slippery and unreliable material. Thus even a gentle push was adequate to achieve results. The book slid far enough to come into contact with a small uncovered work-basket.

In the nature of inanimate objects such as pies, cakes, ash-receivers or any container filled with small articles, there is a quirk which prevents them, when attracted by gravity, from falling right side up. The basket was no exception. With deliberation it performed a half-circle in the air and deposited upon the floor thimble, scissors, pins, needles and various spools which rolled hastily in all directions. Of the three persons in the room only one remained seated. The others rose so rapidly that it might almost be said that they jumped from their chairs. They spoke in chorus: "Appleton!"

The way they said it was in the nature of an accusation. Apple evidently took it as such, for he was quick in defense.

Drawings by Charles R. Chickering

FIRST HE FITTED THE FROG WITH THREAD SUSPENDERS. THROUGH THESE HE PASSED ANOTHER THREAD, LONG AND DOUBLED—AND THE ESCAPING PRISONER WAS READY!

"I never touched the old basket."

This, of course, was no falsehood. Not a finger, or even a toe, had he laid upon the basket. And circumstantial evidence was all in his favor. There he was sitting virtuously upon one end of the couch. Plainly the basket had been far beyond his reach. There was a forced verdict in favor of the defendant, although a shadow of a doubt clouded the minds of the jury.

"Were you bouncing up and down?" inquired his father.

"I wasn't doing a thing. I was just sittin' here," replied Apple with righteous indignation. He rose and joined in the hunt for the errant spools.

"It seems as if I simply couldn't keep this house picked up," complained Mrs. Martin.

Pausing in his search Apple looked at her in honest amazement. Picked up, indeed! Since the letter announcing Aunt Etta's visit he felt that the picking up process had passed all limits. A fellow got into trouble if he laid anything down for a minute. A beetle, so large as to be a rare specimen, had been thrown out ruthlessly just because he had left the box containing it in the living-room. Yes, Aunt Etta undoubtedly was responsible for this picking up, although with the telegram stating that Uncle George also was on the way to visit them it was intensified.

Here was an unknown menace. Apple had never seen his Uncle George. But when a swimmer is out over his head the actual depth of the water makes little difference. Uncle George couldn't add much to Aunt Etta. To be exact, he was a great-uncle, just as Aunt Etta was a great-aunt—relationships were involved as fractions!

Spools restored, the basket was covered and placed on the table out of harm's way. Once more the Martin family seated itself and there was no sound aside from an occasional rustle as Mr. Martin turned the pages of his paper.

CAUTIOUSLY Apple explored the contents of a pocket. He took therefrom a knife, the stub of a pencil, two wire nails, a white stone, a folding rule, a small magnet, a cork and a soiled and crumpled handkerchief. He looked at each article as he removed it. None furnished immediate inspiration. Again exploring, his fingers retrieved a rubber band. This was better. Returning the other things to their original resting-place, Apple took one end of the band in his teeth and, having thus anchored it, stretched and snapped it, at varying tensions, producing a satisfactory harmony.

"Stop that!" said Mr. Martin.

Mrs. Martin looked up from her labor at the desk: "Apple do go out and play."

"There's nothin' to play."

"Well, get a book and read. Do you want mother to find you a book?"

"I've read all the books."

This roused Mr. Martin. Turning in his chair to face his son he spoke severely: "Apple, stop whining. I'm tired of listening to you. It's nonsense to say you've read all the books. The house is full of books."

Apple forsook the couch. It seemed best to get into another atmosphere.

"I guess I'll go play."

Being careful not to hit any of the furniture on the way out, he went into the hall where he paused for a moment. Against the door lay a spool of heavy thread which had evaded the recent search-party. Gathering it up with the intention of returning it to the basket, Apple decided against that course and added it to the collection in his pocket. Then he made his way to the porch and sat down on the steps. It was one of the first hot, still days of the season and through the open windows of the living-room came the sound of voices. Apple craned an ear.

"Apple just must behave this time," he heard his mother say. "I don't know what's the matter. Every time Aunt Etta comes he seems possessed."

"He'll behave or I'll know the reason why," asserted Mr. Martin.

"You remember last time, Jim, when he spilled the ink on her, she threatened to leave."

Apple felt that this was bitterly unjust. Even grown people must realize that unavoidable accidents sometimes happened.

"She's always threatening to leave or to change her will. Amy," his father continued in a voice that was somewhat halting, "you mustn't think that I don't appreciate what your aunt does for us. I do—but I always wish I could make enough so it didn't matter. I'd like to give you everything in the world. I work as hard as I know how."

His father's tone made Apple feel queer inside. Maybe it made his mother feel that way, too, for she answered quickly: "Oh, Jim, don't you see that's just it. I have all I want, but I can't bear to have you work so hard and come home looking tired and worn. And there's Apple."

"Yes," agreed Mr. Martin, "there's Apple."

THERE was an instant of silence. So that was it! Aunt Etta was good to his mother and mysteriously had it in her power to keep his father from working so hard, and he had almost ruined everything. He never had meant to, but that didn't seem to make any difference. Apple's heart was like lead. Nevertheless, he listened when the conversation was resumed.

"It wouldn't be so bad if it wasn't for your Uncle George. Why in the world," almost wailed Mrs. Martin, "did they have to pick the same time to visit us?"

"I couldn't help it," said Mr. Martin defensively. "He had a row with my grandfather and left home before I was born—but, after all, I'm the only near relative he has left. I couldn't wire him not to come."

"Of course you couldn't. But you know Aunt Etta. And goodness knows what your Uncle George is like!"

"I'm sure I don't. I never saw him. He used to write father once in a coon's age from the West somewhere. Looks as if he'd been forty years making enough to pay his fare back. We sure had trouble enough without adding some old chap who likely wears a cowboy hat and hair pants. He and your Aunt Etta will mix like alcohol and Mr. Volstead."

"That's just it, it's what I'm afraid of."

"Well, even if they are coming on the same train, there's one thing I'll say for your Aunt Etta—she won't start fighting before they are introduced."

"You're not much of a comfort, Jim."

"I'm likely to need a lot of first-aid myself before this is over," asserted Mr. Martin gloomily. "Besides, I may be wrong. They may get along like bread and butter."

A renewed rustling indicated that he had resumed the reading of his paper. Apple had heard much of interest. What made the most vivid impression was

ONE INCREASING PURPOSE

"The Man with the Lamp"

By A. S. M. HUTCHINSON

Author of "If Winter Comes" and "This Freedom"

PART SIX—CONCLUSION

CHARLES is come to his Sussex cottage in a fold in the downs.

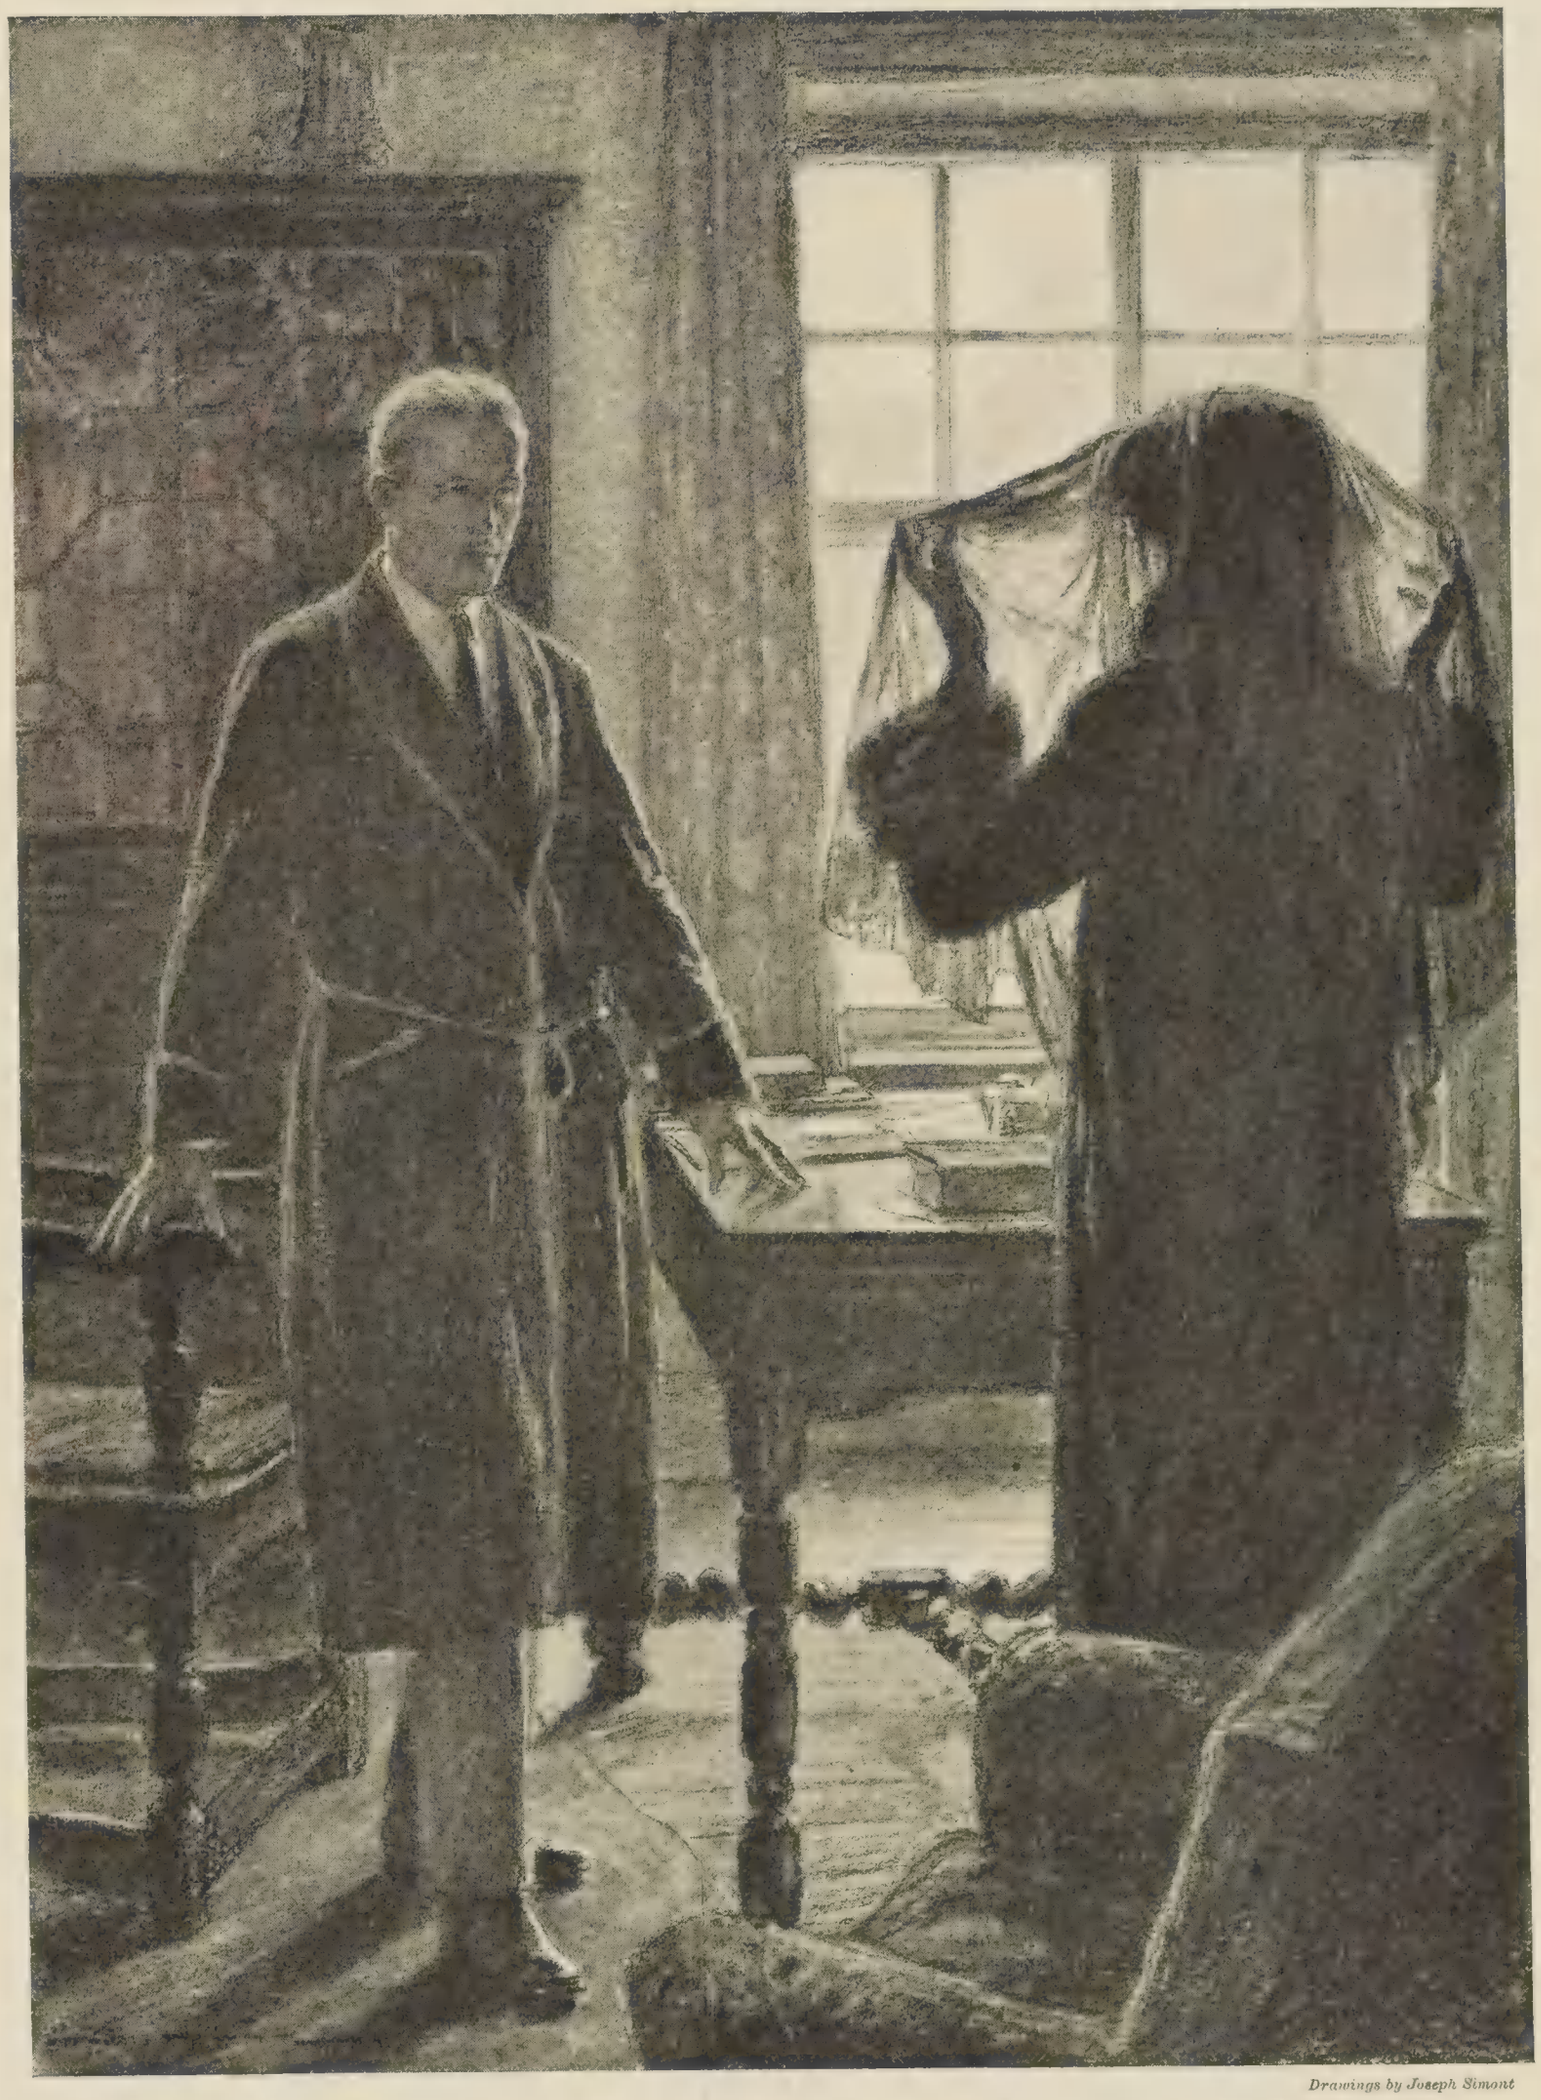
Night now had fallen, he had been there since early afternoon, and he was standing now in the middle of the living-room—and had been standing just like that for quite a considerable time.

Everything had been splendid during the daylight. He now was experiencing the darkness, and he felt a sense solely of the enormous silence all about him. He could feel it as if it were an atmosphere. He could hear it as if it were immensely distant music, half-caught, sounding in his ears. He just stood there, feeling it and listening to it.

All the time right up till now (it now was ten o'clock) he had been actively busy—unpacking, arranging, exploring, examining; much too occupied and excited to eat, and he had eaten nothing all day long. He could not touch any breakfast at home, or any lunch in town, nor as much as think of preparing himself a meal down here; and now, the happy fussing done, he had no desire for nor thought of food or of other creature or material thing; just stood bound all about by this enormous, this sentient and articulate silence.

He had arrived. He had paid and dismissed the car, then he had found the key where the owner had arranged to leave it, under the blue tile (which was loose and lifted up) of the crazy-paving just by the rain-water butt. What thrill in that alone! His own blue tile, its secret his alone—his own crazy-paving, gloriously sunwarmed where he stooped and touched it—his own rain-water butt, three parts full, and he stood on a wooden block beside it and reached down his fingers to the water to salute it. He would touch, he told himself, each single thing in and about the house and then he would go up on to the fold of the downs (his own fold!) and place his hands down flat upon the lovely, springy turf.

He put the key in the door and turned it and entered and had a gust of emotion almost to the point of tears. Cottage of his dreams! And his own! "Mine, Mine!" he whispered, and his arms made a motion of extending to embrace it. The door opened directly into the living-room, a long, narrow room with every piece of furniture looking as if it were as much an essential piece of the room as the windows or the beams; with the hearth capacious as a small vestibule; with the great baking-oven built in the solid wall; with that very old desk standing immediately opposite the door, and the old horse-pistol kept somewhere in it with which he was to have pots at birds. He rummaged in the drawers for it and found it and noted how neatly the artist from whom he had bought the place had had it adapted to take small shot-cartridges and that a box of cartridges was here beside it. He pointed it about the room and imagined himself potting with it—fun!



HE WENT up the old stairway to the two bedrooms above and selected his bed and got out sheets and pillow-cases and prepared it for the night. He unpacked. He went through all the little library of books, treasures that all his life he had meant to read and never had. Jove, the evenings he would spend, in that chair there, books and the lamp and his tobacco and a glass on that little table there! Happy, happy! He could have gone on his knees and poured out the riot of joyousness that surged within his heart.

He put on the famous shoes with their glorious spikes, girt about him that famous belt and took up his stick and went out and climbed the downs, lay flat upon his back and gazed up, up into cloudless perfect blue until he seemed to himself to be rising, to be floating there.

He had started out late. Evening was drawing about the downs and he had all the garden and its outbuildings, the well, the ruins where another cottage once had stood, to explore while yet the light sufficed him. He trod eagerly back, unconscious of fatigue, though all the day body and mind alike had been drawn upon as not in his life before had he taxed them. It was almost night before he was again indoors.

New thrills here. All the place and each and every object in the place to be seen now by lamplight, and he lit the lamps and for hours still was busy as before.

And then, quite suddenly, he was returned to himself.

Drawings by Joseph Simont

LINDA PUT HER HANDS TO HER VEIL AND RAISED IT. "LOOK, SIM," SHE SAID—NOTHING MORE

Quite suddenly, standing in the middle of the room, he realized that he had done everything. What was he to do now? He had no idea. Everything, quite suddenly, seemed to have—stopped.

And with the sense of all things stopped—his occupations, his very heart, time, life, the world itself, all stopped; his mind, his head, encompassed as with bands; all, all of him fastened, tied tight—with these he just stood there, a long time, in the middle of the room.

The silence! There is a phrase, said of one gazing over an enchanting prospect, of being intoxicated with beauty. Charles was as it were gazing out over illimitable vistas of silence and he was intoxicated with stillness.

The silence! He produced an effort and moved and went softly across the room and stood upon the threshold of his outer door and gazed before him. The moon was full, the fold of the downs was a fold of lustrous silver, there was no breath of breeze, there was no movement. The silence! More heavily intoxicated by it, he felt himself possessed now of the impulse which, seizing some mentalities when looking down a great height, causes the desire to impel themselves headlong down. He was seized uncontrollably with the desire to hurl himself into this silence, to become a part of it and to be absorbed in it forever.

Enormously remote there came the faint beating of a motor engine—once, tiny as a pin-point, the sound of its horn. Gone, and deeper and more tingling the silence. He must pitch into it. He could not endure again the scenes he had endured. His whole unhappy life seemed to be swaying him out and into the silence that stood there. The silence! Remote but sharply clear came now the sound of a motor-cycle speeding on some distant road. Tutta-tut-tut-tut. Tutta-tut-tut-tut-tut-tut. Like pistol shots. Pistol?

He turned and took four steps to where the desk stood behind him.

AT A DESK, as Charles turned, also was occupied another. Alice in the Blackheath house was sitting at correspondence. She had a letter to write and a telegram. She had written the letter. It was to Charles. She now was about to write the telegram, to Sim, to be sent off to-morrow.

Thus was Alice making final preparations to leave her husband and elope with Conrad Bryne. She had written in the letter: "But I grew, I cannot ever to myself discover how, to love Conrad."

How had it happened? There was a time when, sensing danger, holding on to good, she had begged Sim take up his residence with them, feeling that in his presence would be the support she felt that she would need. Looking back upon herself in those fire-playing days she saw the self that she was then, simple, conventional, faithful, chaste, starting to burn at that fire by being in Conrad's arms. And now she was literally into the fire's blazing glow, consumed in flame—waiting the sign and word and place from Conrad—now, at this moment, waiting to join him and to go with him to-morrow.

How had it happened?

The answer, long pursued, suddenly came to Alice seated there. As if in a vision, she heard, very quietly:

"Alice, it was your desire to bring romance again into your life that lured you through all that, and that has brought you here to this. You found romance and now you are its victim. You can not escape it and you do not wish to escape it. You are bound to it. You would not leave it if you could. But you entered into it deliberately. You had had romance once in your life, when by the summer-house Charles clasped his arms about you, and dull monotonous years had come, and Conrad presented himself and looked at you, and you had suddenly the thought of rekindling romance anew. He looked at you and you at him—and, lo! there stirred in you the thought, 'A new interest! Alluring, rather nice, intriguing!' Restraint came between you, and your thought of that restraint was, 'This is fun!' and deliberately you pushed on to exploit that fun. 'Romance again! Romance rekindled! A lover!' You were only playing with fire then, deliberately, to amuse yourself, and you thought, if at that time you ever gave the matter any thought, that when you wished you could come back out of it, put it away, return to Charles. But you could not."

She knew now; and knowing it, sat and pondered it.

She moved. She had been sitting a long time. She was cold. She must go to bed. She wiped her eyes. The telegram to Sim was yet to write and she took up her pencil again and wrote it. To-morrow was the vital day for it to go and for her to go. To-morrow expired Sim's term of quarantine. If she delayed her flight, Sim, released from confinement and with business perhaps to do, might come up to town and see her and she did not dare to see Sim. As it was, receiving the telegram to-morrow, he would be able to go at once to Charles and her letter to Charles she would post so that it should reach him while Sim was with him.

She drew the pad toward her and wrote her message: "Charles is at (she gave the address). Please go to him at once without moment's delay. This is the promise that you gave me some months ago to go to him when I should tell you the time had come, and the time has come now. Please go to him immediately. Charles wants you, Sim."

HE HELD HER IN HIS ARMS: "ELIZABETH, ELIZABETH!"—"SIM, SIM!"

But Charles did not want Sim. Charles on the threshold of the cottage of his dreams lay dead, the pistol in his rigid hand.

IN AN aftertime—looking forward for a moment to view perspectively matters too poignant for direst narrative—B. C. D., putting a preface to a completed document, wrote—

" . . . If here and there this book of mine slips, despite me, into the story form it is because the novel is my trade and the trick of it hard to shake off. But I have tried, as I have said, to avoid it. My intention has been to set down the plain facts as I have received them from intimate sources—from Mrs. Charles Paris, from Conrad Bryne, from Linda Paris, from Elizabeth Glade—lastly, and coloring them all, from the man Simon Paris himself. For my own part I have this comforting thought—that though in my life I have done no more than earn a little notoriety, to be shoveled back to me with the earth and left there with me when they cover me in, one small but glorious share I have had in a mighty thing: it was I who gave Sim Paris that famous yellow caravan of his!

"It once was mine—I left it bogged in a wood and I had it hauled out and gave it to him when his Purpose came to him. And that and no other is the caravan which he has taken through length and breadth of England as a lamp—no, the other way about—which has taken him through length and breadth of England as a lamp carried through a dark house. That is the caravan from which he gave his Purpose to the world—that is the caravan from which he gave to happy hands—to all sorts and conditions of men and women—the tiny spot of purple ribbon you see now in the buttonholes of half, of two-thirds of all the folk you meet. It is in Lardy Quinnet's, it is in mine—I scarcely can say more to show how wide it flies. I have seen it on the lapel of a prince, I have seen it on the bosom of a famous musical-comedy dancer, I have seen it on a member of the Cabinet, I have seen it in the button of a burly working man as he came spinning out chucked from an East-end pub—the tiny spot of ribbon, the symbol that means—well, all the world knows what it means. Soon, I believe, all will be wearing it."

Here also is an extract from B. C. D.'s book of the life of Simon Paris: " . . . This was the day, remember, when first I saw him with what I called the light upon him—the day on which, come out from standing beside his dead brother, he first showed that light, then newly within him, to others. He came to break the news of Charles to Alice. He found her, a cab outside the door, just off apparently on a journey.

"Alice, are you just leaving for a visit somewhere?"

"Yes, Sim. My wire—did you not get it?—to go to Charles?"

"Yes, I went. Old girl, I have something to tell you."

His face, his tone, forewarned her.

"Something has happened?—an accident?"

"Yes, an accident, Alice. Sit down, old girl. It is a little bad. Comfy? Alice, old Charles——"

His mouth was working.

"Sim! Charles is not dead?"

"Yes, dead, old girl."

"Sim, Sim, Sim!"

She lay back in her chair. She wore a flower on her breast. While he stood and watched her, her hands went slowly groping up and drew the flower out and dropped it down beside her.

He took her from the chair, he thought that she had fainted, and lifted her upon the sofa. She had not fainted. She clung to him—"Sim, Sim!"—no other word. There was something about that man that day (and ever after) that made him like a rock in tide of trouble.

When presently he had told her everything, she, distraught, told him about herself—she was running away, had been upon the point of starting, with Conrad Bryne.

It startled him, you may suppose. But all he said, smoothing back her hair upon her forehead, was, "Old girl, that is all right now. Charles never knew that. Charles loved you and you loved Charles—that is all old Charles knows now. Old girl, that love that you and old Charles had when first you loved is fresh forever in the mind of God. God hands it back to old Charles now."

"Sim, Sim!"

"Nothing of what you have told me matters now, old girl. All that is all right now."

"Sim, Sim, Sim!"

He got the trunks off the cab, that man; and he went around to Conrad Bryne.

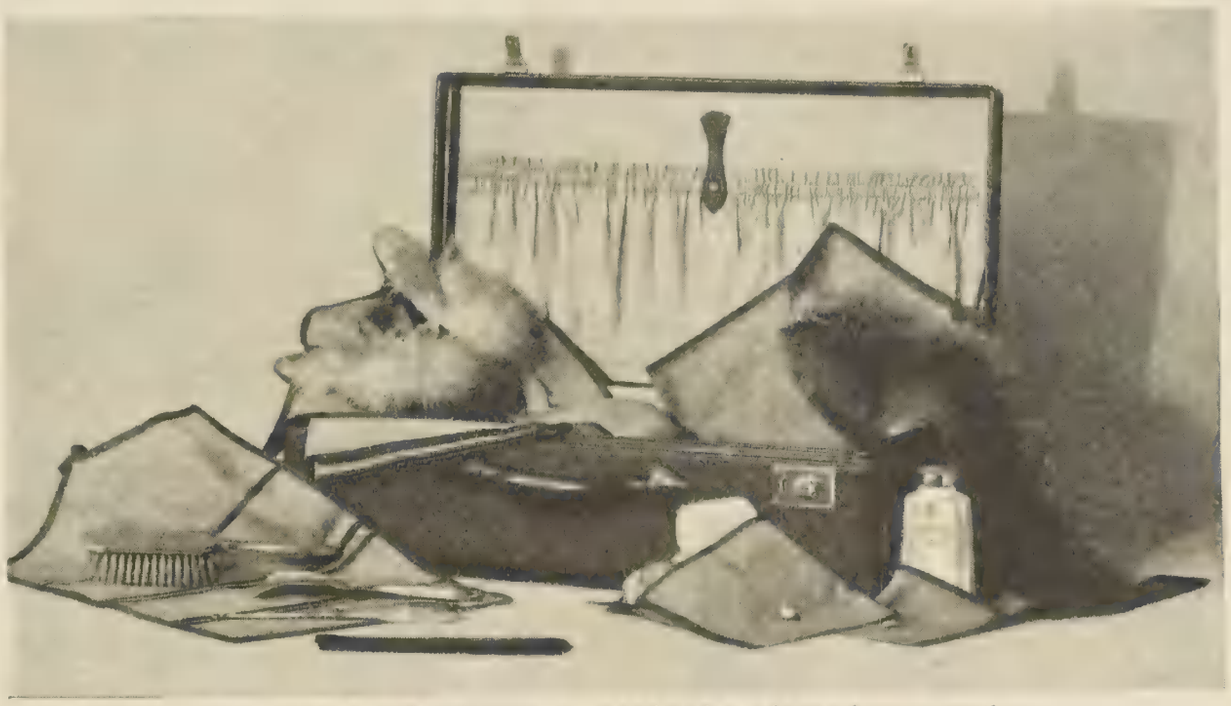
Gifts that never stay at Home



Novel ideas for pleasing the traveler

IT'S NEVER TOO SOON!

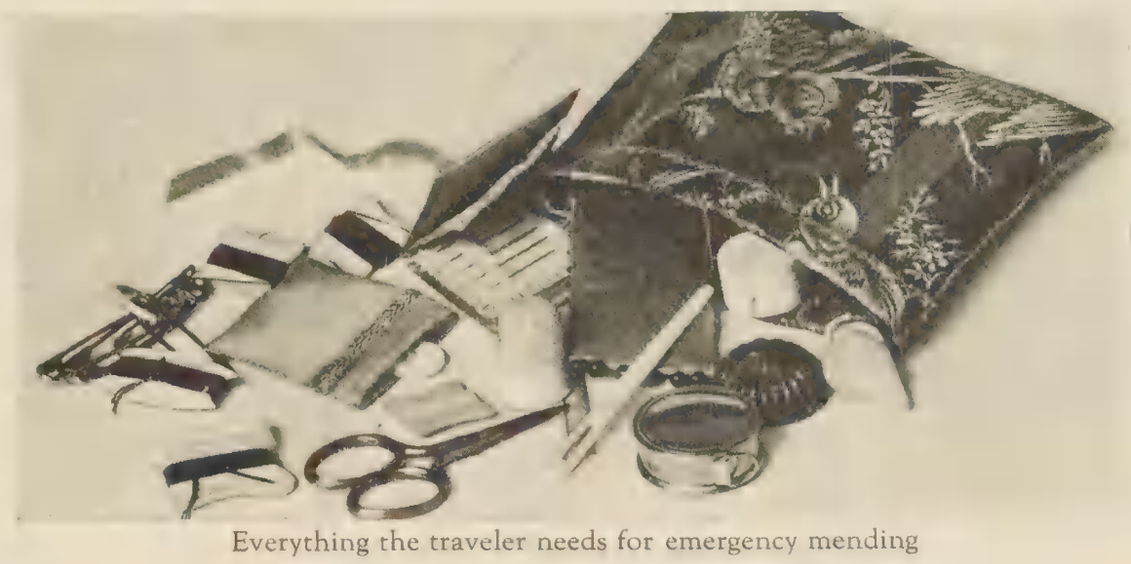
Start making your Christmas gifts now, and you won't need to join the mad scramble at the last minute. Here are some thoughtful gifts for the friend who is planning a trip soon or for any one who travels frequently. Mrs. Sanders will gladly tell you how to make them if you write her at the House Decoration Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

This collapsible hat-box can be folded in a small flat package when not in use. Made of two circles of chocolate-brown oilcloth and lined with a rose-colored chintz. The seams are bound with black bias seam binding. In the center of the outer circle three large initials taken from a transfer pattern are painted on with black oil-paint. Black snap-fasteners make a neat closing along the seams just under the narrow strap handle

A six-piece set for the accessories that lose themselves so easily

A new combination cushion and bag which will hold a multitude of small traveling comforts. To make: Two pieces of chintz, sixteen by twenty-eight inches, are stitched up each side and then through the middle. This will hold two flat down cushions. The sides of each cushion are then joined and two handles consisting of a strap one and a half inches wide and eight inches long and a ruffle are inserted in the open ends of each cushion

There is a set of four of the most convenient bags and cases made of a pale-green non-rubberized water-proof material feather-like in weight, to hold cold-creams and cleansing-tissues, small clothes-pins and line, smelling-salts and a drinking-cup. The material is cut and seamed as any other would be. And because it comes in a great variety of colors it is possible to match the lining of any fitted suitcase or small trunk. At the upper left, a piece of fabric, nineteen inches long and eight inches wide, is bound with a narrow peach-colored strip. One end is turned over to a depth of three and one-half inches. This forms a pocket for the tissues. An extra piece four inches long stitched through the middle holds the cold creams. When folded, this case is no larger than a large-size paper envelope and corresponds in color to the other pieces of the set. Both the sponge-bag and the smelling-salts-bag were made double, to prevent any possible leakage or moisture getting to the garments in the suitcase



Just one yard of material makes a comfy elbow pillow and a convenient case for the hot-water bag. At the left, a practical carry-all bag of gay-flowered water-proof fabric is ideal for wash-cloths, tooth-brushes and other damp objects

At the left—Milady finds most convenient a plum-colored suède writing-case, which is just large enough for post-cards, stamps and writing-paper

Above, the collar-bag of red and black checkered chintz needs but half a yard of material, cotton tape, a piece of buckram and some cardboard to make. Cut two circles of cardboard seven inches in diameter. Cover separately on one side with cretonne and whip together. Then a strip of buckram four inches wide and twenty-three inches long is covered on one side with a narrow strip of cretonne, and on the other with a strip fourteen inches wide, which is seamed and bound with tape to make the bag. Collars placed carefully around the circle will leave room for a small jewelry-bag of the same material

Scarlet Fever

"The world is mine"

A treacherous disease now yielding to science

By MATTHIAS NICOLL, Jr., M.D.,
New York State Commissioner of Health

The Happy Child Department

Directed by DR. HENRY L. K. SHAW

Recently President of the American Child Hygiene Association; Consultant of the Division of Maternity, Infancy and Child Hygiene in the New York State Department of Health

SCARLET fever is a definite and distinct disease, although not recognized as such and frequently confused with other diseases until an English physician, Sydenham, in 1675 accurately fixed its status. For how many centuries previously it had existed it is not possible to state. Scarlet fever prevails with seasonal variations throughout the temperate zone, but in warm climates usually in a very mild form and without complications. The largest number of cases occur in the late Winter and early Spring, while the Summer months are practically free from the disease. School attendance and close personal contact incidental to indoor life during the cold months may well account for this variation.

There has been noted a definite but irregular decrease in the number of cases of scarlet fever during the past quarter of a century, while the decrease in the number of deaths caused by it during the same period is nothing less than remarkable. Thus in New York State in 1908 there were reported nearly 1,700 deaths, and in 1924 approximately 250, a decrease of 85 per cent. In that part of the United States from which statistical reports are available, the so-called registration area, in fifteen years (1908-1922) over 61,000 persons died of scarlet fever. A very conservative estimate of the actual number who succumbed to this disease in the United States as a whole during that period would be 80,000.

The conclusions to be drawn from the figures cited are that scarlet fever has become decidedly less prevalent and markedly less virulent. That the number of cases has not decreased proportionately to the number of deaths is logically accounted for by the fact that mild types of the disease frequently fail to be recognized and quarantine measures instituted, and therefore become a focus of infection in communities in which they occur. But deaths from scarlet fever do not by any means tell the whole story, since few diseases leave in their wake a greater number of crippling complications. To scarlet fever must be attributed thousands of cases of hearing impaired to almost total deafness; permanent damage to the kidneys, which sooner or later is certain to affect the child's general health; and varying degrees of affections of the heart. Scarlet fever is justly dreaded by parents and physicians, for it is most treacherous and no one can accurately forecast the outcome until the disease has run its course. While the disease rarely occurs under six months of age and not often under one year, no age is exempt, but nearly half of the cases occur before five years of age and at least three-quarters before the tenth year.

HOW IT SPREADS

SCARLET fever is infectious, but much less readily spread from the sick to the well than most other common communicable diseases, requiring as a rule close and intimate contact. It is spread by the infective discharges from the nose, throat, running ears and abscesses, and not infrequently by contaminated articles of clothing, towels, handkerchiefs, eating utensils, toys and books. The infectious material when dried on such articles and especially when kept free from sunlight may probably set up the disease even after many months. A very common source of outbreaks of scarlet fever is a milk supply which has been contaminated by a milker or person otherwise engaged in the handling of milk who is either suffering from scarlet fever or convalescent from it. The vast majority of cases, however, are caused by direct contact between the sick and well. It is also not infrequently caused by the hands of attendants or friends which have not been properly cleansed and disinfected after contact with the patient. It was formerly believed, and indeed the theory is difficult to down, that the scales (peeled-off skin) were responsible for the spread of scarlet fever. This we know to be a fallacy, except that skin is shed from the fingers which have been placed in the mouth or nose, especially by little children suffering from scarlet fever, may, when brought into contact with the nose and throat of susceptible persons, cause the disease.

CAUSE OF SCARLET FEVER

SEARCH for the cause of scarlet fever has been carried on for many years in laboratories and hospitals throughout the civilized world, but not until 1923 was it definitely established, largely as the result of the work of Dr. George H. Dick and his wife, Dr. Gladys Dick, of Evanston, Illinois. Innumerable experiments by research workers on different varieties of the lower animals inoculated with the blood and discharges from scarlet fever patients had failed to produce a true picture of the disease.

After painstaking study it was finally established beyond reasonable doubt that the germ which causes scarlet fever belongs to a special group of organisms known as streptococci, so frequently associated with severe local inflammatory processes and so-called blood poisoning. Furthermore, it was demonstrated that this organism or this group of organisms in the course of growth produces a poison or toxin which by itself is the immediate cause of the high fever, and that by injecting such toxin into a horse in small and increasing doses an antitoxin is produced which is proving of remarkable value in the treatment of the disease. Again, this toxin, greatly diluted, when injected into the skin in minute quantities will produce after a few hours a small local area of redness at the site of infection in those persons who when exposed to scarlet fever will be very likely to contract it, but not in those who by reason of a previous attack of the disease, or possibly by reason of a natural resistance, are immune to scarlet fever. This procedure, known as the "Dick Test," is wholly analagous to the so-called Schick test for determining susceptibility or immunity to diphtheria, but up to the present time it is not as clean-cut or readily interpreted as the latter, and requires still further study to demonstrate an equal value.

Just as the dilute diphtheria toxin is used to produce immunity, so the greatly diluted toxin of scarlet fever injected in minute quantities and in three doses at weekly intervals has been very successfully used to immunize selected cases, especially those exposed to or likely to be exposed to the disease. Unfortunately, it is probable that such immunity is not of a very long duration, probably not more than six months to a year.

While many laboratory workers in this country and abroad should be credited with having paved the way, the definite establishment of the cause of scarlet fever and the practical utilization of the fact by a method of diagnosis, protection, and, most important of all, a specific treatment for the disease, are due to the brilliant work of the Doctors Dick and Dochez, a discovery which should be classed as one of the great achievements of medical science in the twentieth century and a triumph for American research.

PERIOD OF INCUBATION OF SCARLET FEVER

THE time elapsing between exposure to the germs of the disease and the development of first symptoms is from forty-eight hours to one week. Very rarely it develops a little earlier or later than these periods. In most instances symptoms develop on the fourth day, and if the person known to have been directly exposed to scarlet fever shows no signs of the disease after a week it may be confidently expected that he will escape.

HOW TO RECOGNIZE SCARLET FEVER

THE three classic symptoms which usher in scarlet fever are fever, sore throat and sudden vomiting. Headache is often complained of and a chill or convulsion, the latter usually in young children. In older children and adults, vomiting is less constant than in the very young. In a typical case of average severity the temperature rises rapidly and reaches 103 degrees to 105 degrees. The pulse rate is very greatly increased and the patient is quite apt to show more or less mental disturbance or even active delirium. Within twenty-four to forty-eight hours the rash appears at the side of the neck below the ear tips and chin and extends rapidly downward over the body to the hands, legs and feet. It is especially well marked on the upper part of the chest, in front of the armpits and in the groins, and is composed at first of tiny red points which soon coalesce to form a brilliant red coloring over a greater part of the body. The tongue is heavily coated except about the edges. The cheeks are flushed, but the true rash does not usually invade the face. The brilliant red lips are in marked contrast to the pallor of the skin about them. If the throat is examined in a good light, the tonsils and the hard and soft palate will be found to be reddened and more or less swollen. There may be white spots on the tonsils or even a membrane resembling diphtheria.

If everything goes well, the rash gradually fades from above downward, leaving the skin rough and dry. The fever falls a little day by day until at the end of a week or ten days, provided there are no complications, it has reached normal. The pulse rate is apt to increase out of proportion to the temperature, and usually remains somewhat elevated even after the latter has reached normal. The tongue after the fourth or fifth day loses its thick coating and usually becomes a brilliant red with little swollen dots scattered over its surface, the so-called "strawberry" or "cat's" tongue, which is very characteristic of the disease. In the second or third week the skin begins to peel, most noticeably about the edges of the finger-nails, and soon comes off in smaller or larger flakes, very frequently helped by the patient, until the finger-tips, heels and soles become glazed, red and soft.

This is a brief picture of a well-marked case of uncomplicated scarlet fever, but anywhere in the course of the disease, or even in convalescence, complications may change it. The temperature, instead of gradually falling, may continue above normal day after day, due to a very severe throat condition with enlarged and infected glands in the neck; or after becoming nearly or quite normal it may suddenly rise, due to infection of the middle ear, not infrequently followed by mastoid disease, or again because the germs of the disease have invaded the blood stream and caused general infection.

Even in convalescence, in the second or third week, the patient is not fully "out of the woods." At this time a sudden rise of temperature generally indicates that the

AFTER OCTOBER 1, 1925

The Happy Baby Clubs are a year old now.

This year has seen many members enrolled. Since an increase in numbers always means a decrease in costs, we are happy to announce that the clubs will be continued at twenty-five cents for a year's membership—instead of fifty cents. After October 1st you may join any one of these clubs at that rate.

There are four clubs—one for the Expectant Mother, a second for Mothers of the New Baby, another for Mothers of the Runabout, and a fourth for Mothers of the School Child. In each one you get a monthly letter from Doctor Shaw on timely topics of child care and training—for just the cost of postage on the letters, if you ordered them separately.

PICTURE EDITOR—ROBERT GRAEF

THE PETER PAN STATUE IN KENSINGTON GARDENS, WHERE LONDON CHILDREN PLAY

CHEERIO, CHILDREN!

(That's the greeting you hear oftenest in England.) Here I am in the quaintest little fishing village called Clovelly, living in a pretty white cottage on a steep hill leading to the sea, eating my meals, especially the clotted cream for which this part of England is so famous, in an old inn six hundred years old, named The Red Lion, that was once swept over by a tidal wave. The boats here tie up to iron posts said to be guns from the Spanish Armada. Cobbled little High Street is so steep that many lady visitors in their high heels have to ride up and down on small donkeys; no wagons or automobiles can run, and coal and groceries and such are carried on a sort of sledge with runners, even in Summertime!

Almost all English cottages have door-knockers, so for your prize this month, I bought a brass knocker from Clovelly, with High Street for the back, and a boy with a sledge for the knocker part. You may use it on the door of your own room or give it to mother at Christmas. So try for the prize.

Cheerio! Guess where Deli-bear and I shall be next. Your loving editor-in-England, HARRIET IDE EAGER

WIN A CLOVELLY DOOR-KNOCKER

After your editor comes home, we'll have an American Number. What pictures and stories and places do you think should be in it? What kind of cover shall we have? What would make a good prize? The most helpful letter, giving the most interesting ideas for an American Number of THE LITTLE DELINEATOR, will win this brass door-knocker from Clovelly, England. Second prize—a big picture by Mr. Graef, like this month's Peter Pan cover, framed. Contest closes November 20th. Address November Contest, THE LITTLE DELINEATOR, New York, N. Y. Send a stamped, self-addressed envelope for an answer from your editor, telling you more about "Treasure Island—The Children's Paradise."

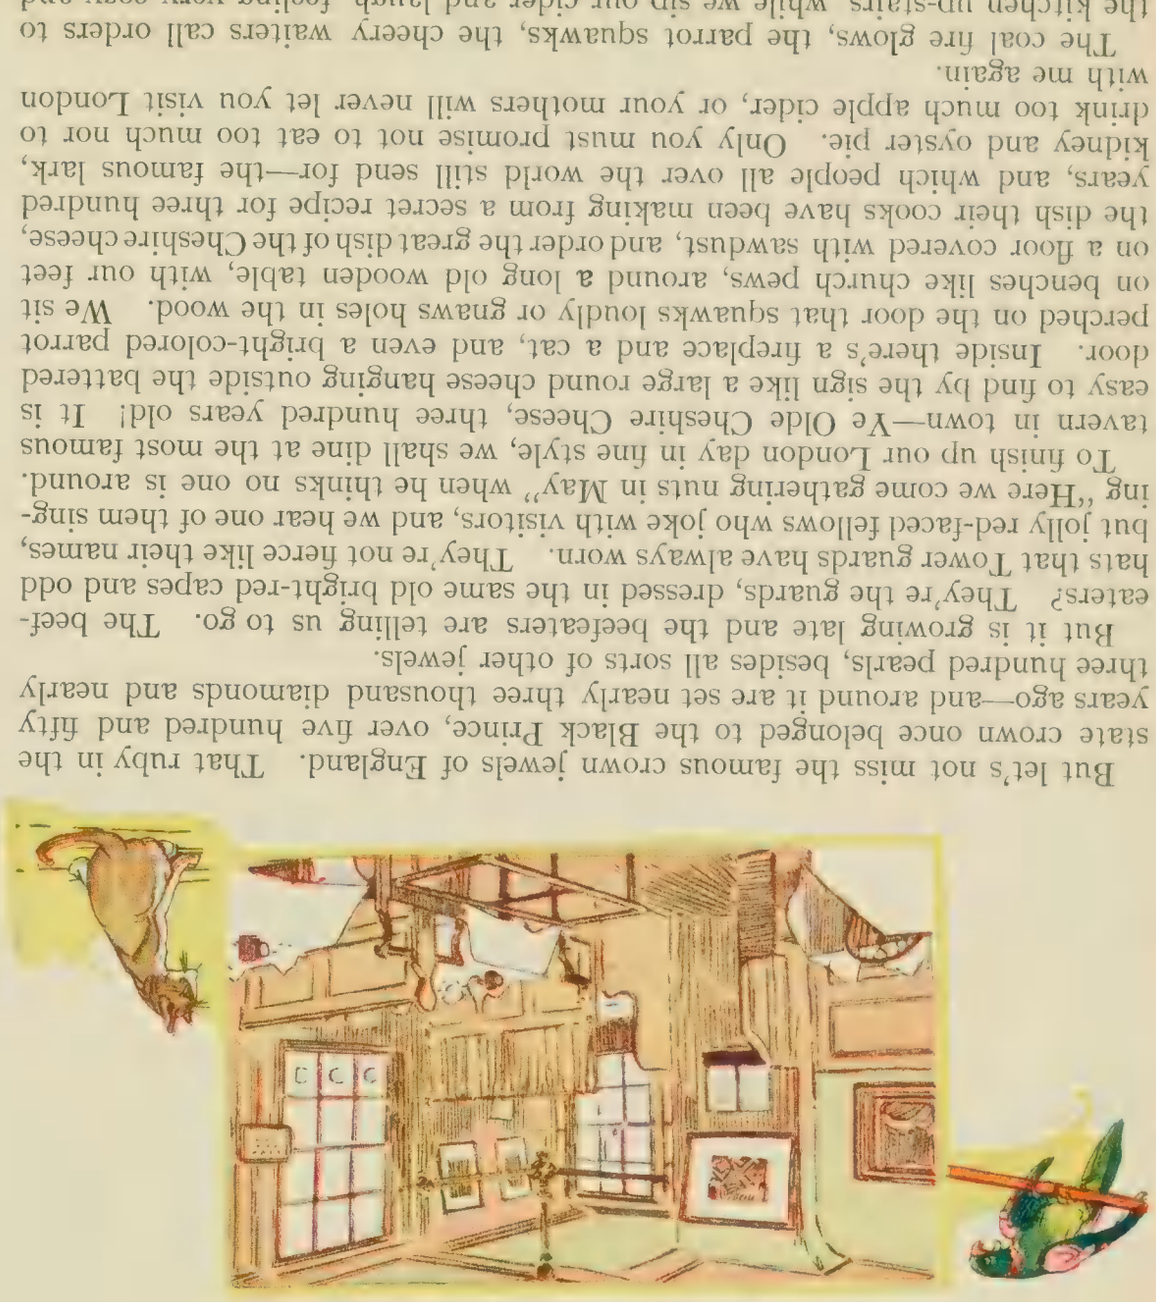
DELI-BEAR DOWN THE CHIMNEY

1—A funny friend our Deli-bear has found in London-town—
This jolly, sooty chimney-sweep who cleans the chimneys down.

2—"Please take me with you," Deli begs, and clasps his Deli-paws.
"I'll climb down to the children's room and play I'm Santa Claus!"



3—Down, down they go. The air is black as pitch and tar and ink,
Till soon, "Where are you?" Deli cries. "Hey, boy, I'm lost, I think!"

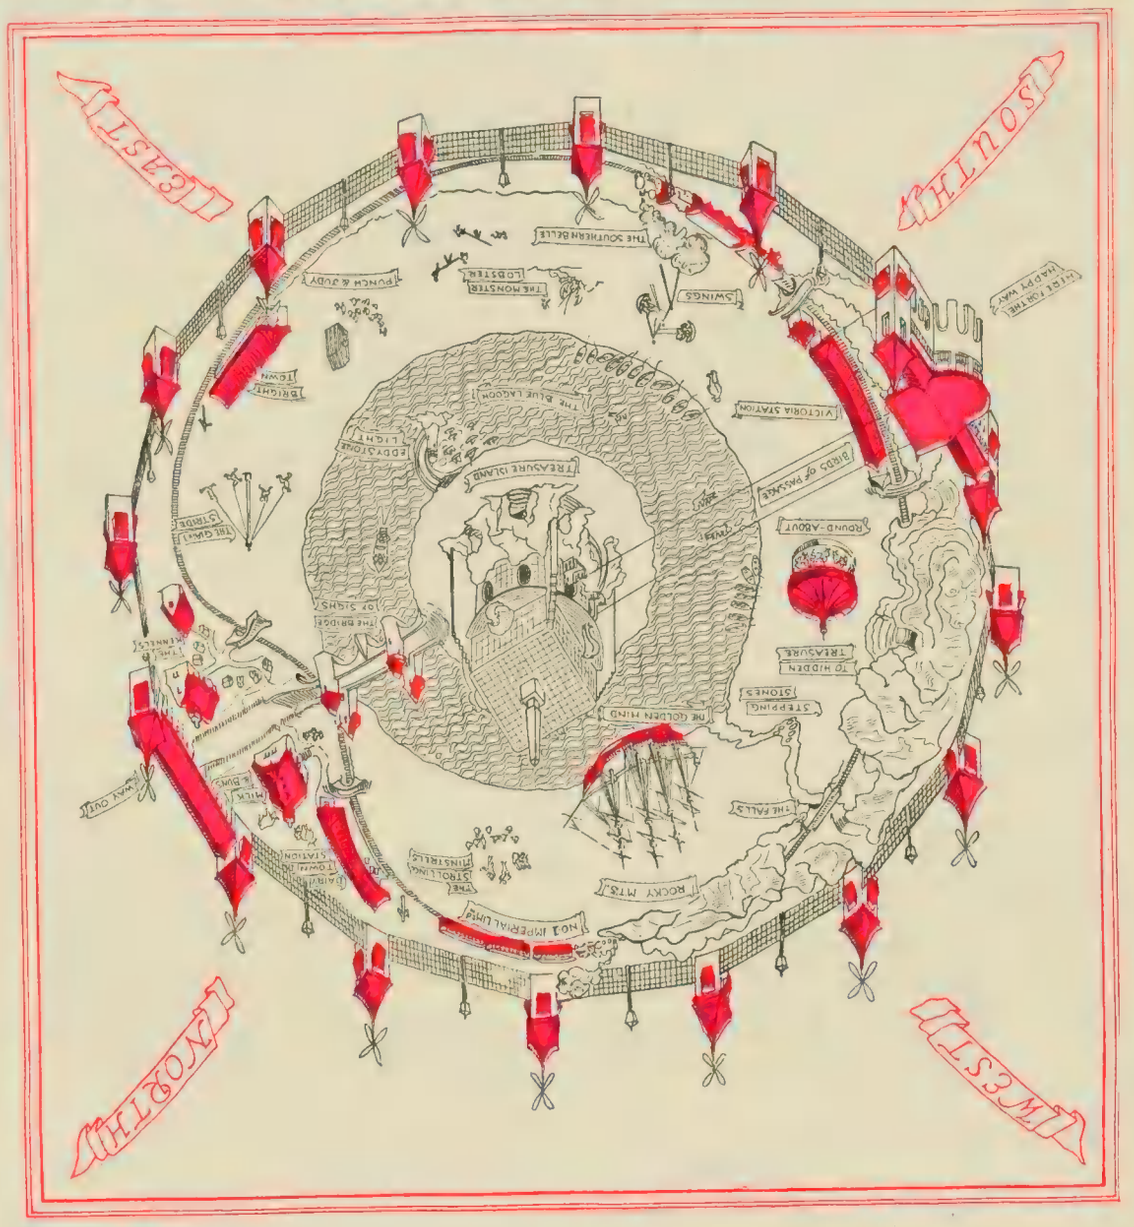
4—No answer. Not a sound. So on he stumbles in a fright,
When bang! he sees a star or two and falls into the light.

5—He's in an English nursery, and how the children dance
To see a chimney-sweeping bear in sooty, yellow pants!

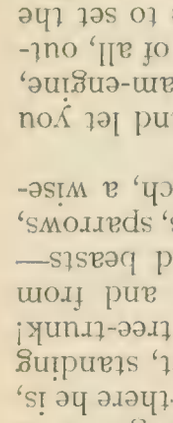
6—Till suddenly they spy his badge. "You're Deli-bear," they've guessed. "We read about you every month and always like you best!"

But let's not miss the famous crown jewels of England. That ruby in the state crown once belonged to the Black Prince, over five hundred and fifty years ago—and around it are set nearly three thousand diamonds and nearly three hundred pearls, besides all sorts of other jewels.

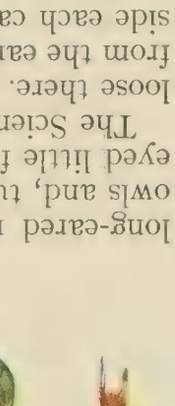
But it is growing late and the beefeaters are telling us to go. The beefeaters? They're the guards, dressed in the same old bright-red capes and odd hats that Tower guards have always worn. They're not fierce like their names, but jolly red-faced fellows who joke with visitors, and we hear one of them singing "Here we come gathering nuts in May" when he thinks no one is around.



To finish up our London day in fine style, we shall dine at the most famous tavern in town—Ye Olde Cheshire Cheese, three hundred years old! It is easy to find by the sign like a large round cheese hanging outside the battered door. Inside there's a fireplace and a cat, and even a bright-colored parrot perched on the door that squawks loudly or gnaws holes in the wood. We sit on benches like church pews, around a long old wooden table, with our feet on a floor covered with sawdust, and order the great dish of the Cheshire cheese, the dish their cooks have been making from a secret recipe for three hundred years, and which people all over the world still send for—the famous lark, kidney and oyster pie. Only you must promise not to eat too much nor to drink too much apple cider, or your mothers will never let you visit London with me again.

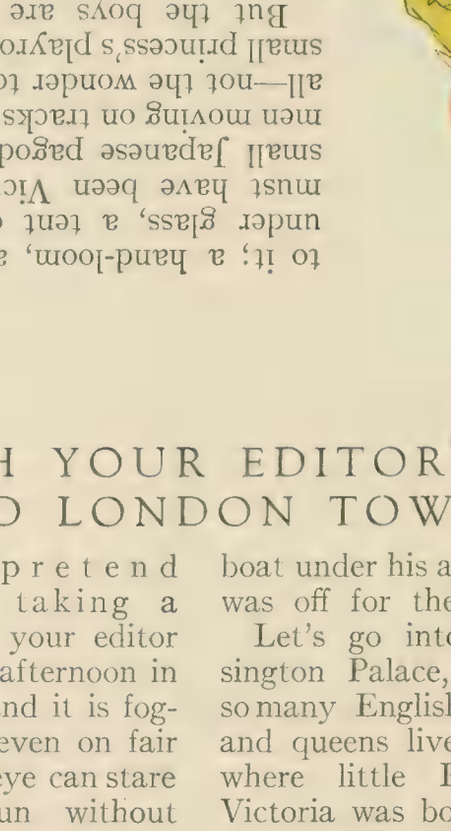


The coal fire glows, the parrot squawks, the cheery waiters call orders to the kitchen up-stairs, while we sip our cider and laugh, feeling very cozy and happy—but sorry that our day in old London town is over.

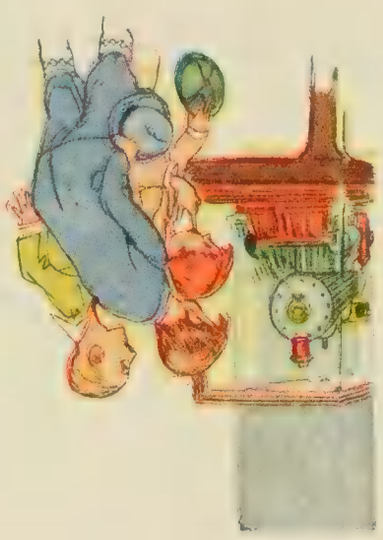


TREASURE ISLAND—THE CHILDREN'S PARADISE

ALL English children nowadays are teasing their fathers and mothers for a visit to the big exposition at Wembley, near London, to see the palaces and wonders from India and Bermuda and Guiana and all the far-away places of the British empire. But most of all they flock to "Treasure Island," that happy playground where no grown-up may come without a child, no matter how many sixpence admissions he pays. All around a lake called "The



WITH YOUR EDITOR IN OLD LONDON TOWN



LET'S pretend you're taking a walk with your editor this foggy afternoon in London—and it is foggy—why, even on fair days your eye can stare at the sun without squinting. And then there's the smoke pouring from thousands of London chimney-pots, for the English, you know, burn open coal fires in every room.

Now for Kensington Gardens, the park where Peter Pan lived, and the Round Pond, where he played. Small boys and grown men are sailing boats there—and it's a real sport to set the boat's sails to the wind, so that the small craft will reach the other side safely. In a funny play I saw here, a gray-haired business man asked his boss for the afternoon off to "go yachting"—and he put on a yachting cap, tucked a toy boat under his arm and was off for the Pond!

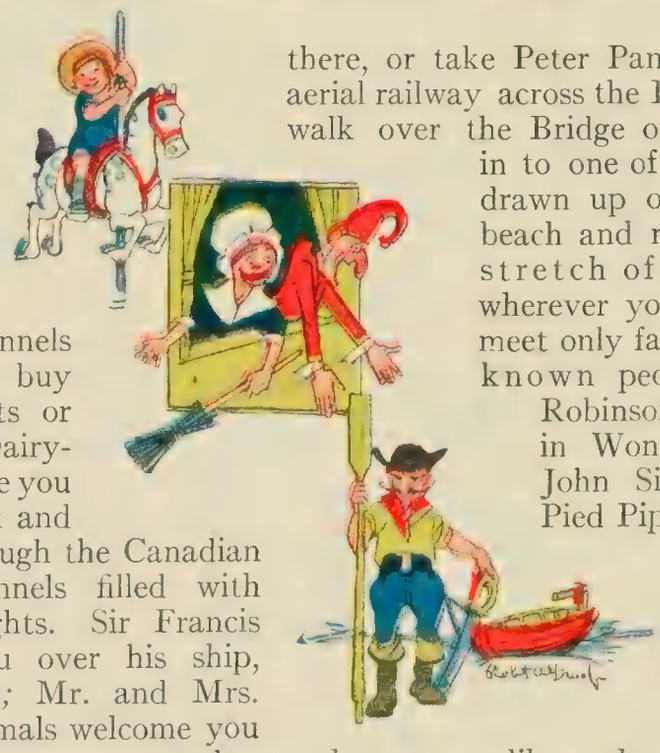
Let's go into Kensington Palace, where so many English kings and queens lived, and where little Princess Victoria was born. It was here, in this very bedroom, that she was waked at five o'clock one morning to be told that her uncle the king was dead, and she was now Queen of England.

Here is her nursery, and her doll-house—just a big, plain living-room and a big old-fashioned kitchen, with a few dingy dolls still standing about. Under glass cases we see other toys—a wax doll with a broken arm, in a white muslin dress and little pantalets; a bed and a coach; a shabby shop-counter with bits of toys glued to it; a hand-loom, an old music-box, a bird under glass, a tent of striped silk and what must have been Victoria's finest treasure—a small Japanese pagoda, with little mechanical men moving on tracks from side to side. That's all—not the wonder toys you would expect in a small princess's playroom, are they?

But the boys are growing bored, so let's hurry to the Science Museum. On the way, we'll ask that giant red-faced Bobby ("Bobbies" are London policemen) to show us the Peter Pan Statue. Of course, in the little grove off the road where all the children stop—there he is, a bronze Peter in a bronze night-shirt, standing on a bronze tree-trunk—but what a tree-trunk! Bronze fairies peep out around it, and from every crack spring bronze birds and beasts—long-eared rabbits with noses shiny from children's kisses, squirrels, sparrows, owls and, tucked away in a corner where the tiniest baby may reach, a wise-eyed little family of field-mice.

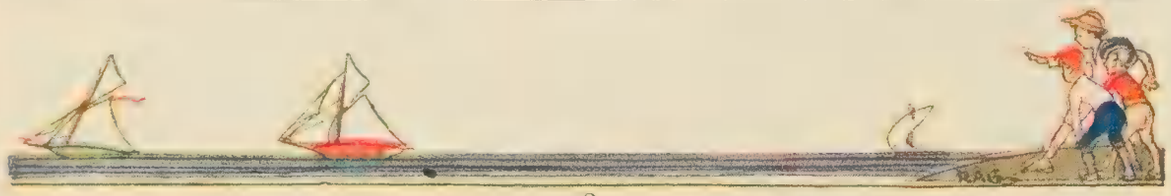
The Science Museum—oh, very well boys, let's hop into a cab and let you loose there. Here in glass cases are perfect small models of the steam-engine, from the earliest comical grandfathers to our giant expresses. Best of all, out-side each case, there's a button you may press as often as you like to set the machinery going—airplane engines too and electric motors of all sorts. Upstairs you'll find tiny ship models from the Viking days to our ocean liners. Do you wonder that many a London boy spends all his Saturday afternoons in the Science Museum?

But Big Ben is striking four in his beautiful deep voice, and it's time for tea—for of course everybody in England, even the prime minister and the busiest business man, stops for a cup of afternoon tea. Here's a tea-room, and how good that red coal fire feels to our shivery bones after the chill and the smoke outside. Just this once, your mother won't mind if you drink a cup of very weak tea, with plenty of cream and sugar, and hot toasted English muffins with orange marmalade, and a bit of raisin cake to top off—for it's hungry work, this sightseeing.



Now, if you're not too tired, take a last bite of cake, and off we'll go to the Tower of London.

The Tower, you know, is really a fortress with seven towers, which William the Conqueror began building nearly nine hundred years ago. Other kings added to it, lived in it and used it as a storehouse



Blue Lagoon" lies a real beach, with tons and tons of real sand, and around the beach runs a little railway, past the Punch and Judy show, past the kennels where you may buy puppies or rabbits or kittens, past the Dairytown Station where you may stop for milk and buns, and on through the Canadian Rockies into tunnels filled with many strange sights. Sir Francis Drake shows you over his ship, The Golden Hind; Mr. and Mrs. Noah and the animals welcome you to the Ark. When you want to hunt for hidden treasure in Aladdin's Cave on the Island, you may ask old Captain Hook, the pirate, to row you there, or take Peter Pan and Wendy's aerial railway across the Blue Lagoon, or walk over the Bridge of Sighs, or get in to one of the tiny boats drawn up on the curving beach and row across the stretch of water. But wherever you go, you will meet only famous and well-known people, such as Robinson Crusoe, Alice in Wonderland, Long John Silver and the Pied Piper of Hamelin.

Here is a real map of this Treasure Island, where you may wander as long as you like under the mountains or in Aladdin's Cave or over the Blue Lagoon—and without paying sixpence, either!

Keeping him Interested

TURN MISTAKES INTO KNOWLEDGE

The lessons the young housekeeper learns during the first months of her married life will stand her in good stead all the remaining days of her housekeeping. This is the time when the new experiences in planning, buying, arranging and running the house should be so organized and systematized that, like the shifting of gears, they may finally become automatic, and hence it will pay her to give herself generously to mastering the lessons to be learned in this apprenticeship period.

Head of the New York State College of Home Economics, Cornell University

Enough ham will be bought to supply a hot meat for the day and a made-over meat dish for the following day. Provision is made to use in an omelet on the third day any that may be left over.

A large enough head of cabbage is bought to give a generous serving the first day, to provide cold slaw the second day and to make a cabbage-and-apple salad for the third day. Enough potatoes will be prepared that day to use next day with the ham in scalloped ham and potatoes.

Apples will give apple sauce for lunch and for apple whip, for baked apples and for apple-and-cabbage salad. Prunes and apricots enough for at least two meals each, one meal with the two combined, prunes enough for a soufflé and apricots for a shortcake, may be bought and cooked ahead. Enough biscuit dough will be made for the shortcake to serve hot biscuits the following morning.

A can of tomatoes will be ample for both soup and salad. If any remains, it may be made into gravy for the veal-chop.

In planning the meals, note that the lunch for the first day is one which may be quickly prepared after the morning's marketing.

DOES HE SUSPECT YOU?

When yesterday's baked ham appears in to-day's hash, does your husband see through the disguise?

You can save money by using left-overs, but don't tire the family with repetition.

"What to Do with Left-Overs," our new leaflet, tells you how something new and delicious may be evolved from the meats, fish, vegetables, bread and fruit that are usually thrown away. You can be a gay deceiver with its assistance, but your deceit will be appreciated when the bills show the saving. Send a two-cent stamp for postage to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and the leaflet will go forward to you immediately.

THE first problem in keeping house for two may be in not knowing how to cook. If that is so, the beginning housekeeper had better buy a cook-book and apprentice herself to it. The recipes in the average cook-book are planned to serve six persons. In dividing the recipes by three, however, remember that a third of a cup of liquid evaporates more rapidly in proportion to amount than a cup when treated in the same-size pan. There must therefore be on hand either small pans for small portions or a little more liquid must be added.

With some background of knowledge of how to cook, the difficulties in getting meals for two will consist largely in knowing how much of a given food to buy at any one time, how much money one may reasonably allow for food each month and where this amount may be spent to greatest advantage.

How much should be spent each month for food for two people? It has been determined by families of two, living in sections of the country where the cost of food is high, that the food bill for a month need not exceed twenty-five dollars or thirty dollars if the housewife is skilful in marketing, economical and intelligent. This means the standard good dietary. For two, that will be: a quart of whole milk and occasionally some extra cream, two vegetables besides potatoes, potatoes once a day, meat once, bacon or egg or cheese once, bread, cereals as needed, sweets, butter and other fats in reasonable amounts, and ice-cream occasionally.

The best results in buying food may be obtained if the housewife is willing to do her own marketing. In doing this, she should take a basket, so that at least a few perishable products may be carried home immediately, and advantage may be taken of possibly lower prices and fresher products at cash-and-carry stores and markets.

More economical buying is always possible when one has planned meals carefully for several days or a week ahead and buys according to that plan. This enables the shopper to cut down the number of journeys to market, and it helps to decrease the actual amount of cooking necessary, because foods may be bought with an eye to to-day's needs and to-morrow's as well. A roast and spinach for Sunday may, with a little foresight, be seen as cold meat and salad for Monday, and, skipping a day, even as baked hash and cream soup for Wednesday.

A plan for three days' menus illustrates this point.

THE ECONOMICAL BRIDE DOES HER OWN MARKETING, AND DOES NOT SCORN TO TAKE ADVANTAGE OF CASH-AND-CARRY PRICES

IN COOKING FOR TWO, IT IS ECONOMICAL TO USE SMALL COOKING UTENSILS, WHICH ARE EASIER TO CARE FOR AND TAKE UP LESS SPACE

So far as possible, the housewife should always plan to have at least one fresh vegetable a day. In Summer both vegetables should be fresh, though in Winter one vegetable may be canned.

In general a safe rule is to allow a half-pound of the green vegetables and cabbage and a pound of other fresh vegetables to furnish a medium-sized serving for each of two persons. When using vegetables of which the family is particularly fond, it may be necessary to increase this allowance. Select only those vegetables which are distinctly fresh, firm, crisp, suitable in size and

Director, Department of House Decoration and Home Building

A GLORIFIED ATTIC SPACE WITH STAIRS—ONCE AN OLD LADDER—LEADING TO A LOVELY AIRY ROOF-GARDEN

WHETHER you blame it on lack of servants, high cost of building or what, apartment homes are multiplying to-day almost as fast as rabbits multiplied in Australia.

That few of them have the hominess and charm so often found in small houses may be because they never seem permanent enough to fuss over, or because it is usually considered the height of folly to improve the landlord's property.

To make one room and bath interesting, even for a short period, does certainly require interest and enthusiasm, but the resulting comfort and cheerfulness are ample compensation. First, the utmost care must be exercised in the choosing of a wall color or decoration; as apartment rooms are generally not large, and frequently open into each other, it is wisest to carry the same color scheme throughout. As a note of variation, draperies for each room may be different, though they should harmoniously blend or contrast with other curtain fabrics and the wall decoration.

It is best, in the case of very small apartments, to have walls, woodwork, floors, floor-coverings, draperies and glass-curtain materials alike. This helps to create the idea of space, and does not cut into small units an apartment already smaller than it should be.

The eye and the mind will find it far more restful to gaze upon materials of the same color and design than upon an assortment of these. It can be easily understood why amateurs select the ivories or grays for their wall colors. They are perfectly safe background colors for furniture of every type and fabrics of every color and description, but when one considers the thousands of apartment interiors with neutral-colored walls, it is readily understood why such homes never acquire the atmosphere and individuality of a small house. Realizing that most apartments are leased for a year or longer, and that the owner does it over for a good tenant, why not work out an individual color scheme and furniture arrangement?

TO THE FLAT-DWELLER!

If you face the problem of converting four bleak walls—an attic or a basement apartment—into a cozy home, consult our House Decoration Department. Send a sketch of your floor-plan, with a few details as to walls, woodwork, and so forth, and Mrs. Sanders will suggest ways of furnishing. She has also a descriptive list of built-in features, furniture that folds away, and all sorts of attractive devices.

IN DARK, cheerless apartments, the Spanish pinks, sun-color yellows and pumpkin will help to bring warmth and cheer, while soft greens, blue-gray and lilac will subdue the sunnier flats. All these colors may be obtained in paints, tints, and even wall-papers. The striped and small all-over designs in wall-paper are less likely to fill small rooms. Woodwork and the little necessary built-in features may be painted the same, or oil-stained a shade slightly darker than that used on the wall and then waxed. Such a wood finish is very individual. If the floor-boards are rough, black paint or a dark-colored wood-stain, the same as the woodwork, makes a good background for small rugs. Plain carpets by the yard which, since the perfection of the vacuum cleaner, are being more and more indulged in, can be used to cover the entire floor, giving a dignity and especially an air of "hominess" to apartments. This type of floor-covering, however, comes too expensive to some, who feel the urge of covering worn boards. Linoleum in plain colors or simple patterns can be used with most pleasing results, and most interesting color schemes can be built from it as a floor background. Over this, rugs are all that is necessary.

Don't accept Infirmity!

Exercise will cure many bodily defects

By
FIELDING H. YOST
Director of Intercollegiate Athletics, University of Michigan

THE circus caused a friend of mine some embarrassing moments recently. It involved him in a ticklish theological discussion. He had taken his little boy to see it, and the youngster was greatly disturbed by the three-legged man. He talked about him in his high, childish treble all the way home, for the three-legged man had upset what the little boy had considered a well-ordered universe. "But, daddy, you said that God made everything perfect. Then why did he make the three-legged man that way?"

By the time we have grown up most of us realize that nobody is physically perfect, and we manage to keep our religious beliefs in spite of that knowledge. What we don't so readily realize is that for many of our physical imperfections we have only ourselves to blame. If our bodies are not straight and strong and supple, it's often because we are eating improperly, or living unhygienically, or taking the wrong kind of exercise—or no exercise at all.

In my article in the September DELINEATOR I showed why it was especially necessary for the home-making women between the ages of seventeen and thirty-two—a group in which the death rate has been steadily rising—to have regular physical examinations which will reveal to them any defects they may have—defects which may be remedied if taken in time, but may grow to be very serious if neglected. Some of these defects call for medical treatment, some demand changed living conditions; but others, the ones with which I am particularly concerned, may be cured, or at least greatly improved, by proper exercise and attention to the cardinal rules of hygiene. All one needs is a little time, a little knowledge of what to do and a little strength of mind to do it. I am counting on you to find the time and supply the strength of mind; here is some of the knowledge.

ONE of the most frequent defects of women in the seventeen-to-thirty-two group is faulty elimination. Unless the waste material that passes through the body is completely eliminated at regular intervals, the entire system is poisoned and weakened. Many of the disorders of which women frequently complain can be traced directly to this cause.

Modern habits of living and eating are largely responsible for the great prevalence of constipation. Lack of vigorous outdoor exercise, insufficient drinking of water, eating of soft cooked foods, a concentrated meat diet, lack of cellulose or waste material in the diet and neglect of the bowel function are the chief causes. In most cases, therefore, it is a preventable condition. There are but few cases that can not be greatly benefitted by the proper diet and exercise. Warm or hot water, taken freely on an empty stomach some time before eating, is very helpful, especially if followed by a few moments of vigorous exercise. These exercises should involve activity of the abdominal muscles, such as trunk bending and twisting from a standing position (Fig. 7), or leg raising from a supine position (Fig. 2).

In very obstinate cases of faulty elimination, or those complicated by other diseases, competent medical advice should be sought.

Many times each day the average individual is asked, "How do you do?" An apt corollary might well be, "How do you stand?" For how you stand has a great deal to do with "how you do." Good posture means better appearance and bearing, and the condition and attitude of being wide-awake. It also means conservation of energy and provides for a proper growth and development of the vital organs.

Posture training is especially pertinent in the present day, when there seems to be a marked tendency to "slouch" or "slump." Rounded shoulders and relaxed abdominal walls are often associated with serious nervous maladies. Prolapse, "falling" of the stomach, abdominal organs or pelvic organs, and constipation frequently accompany faulty posture.

One stands correctly when the "support" line of the body (a line drawn from the ankle bone to the ear and passing through the middle of the knee joint, the hip bone and the point of the shoulder) is straight. This line should incline very slightly forward from the perpendicular to throw the weight of the body on the balls of the feet. Posture is affected by all parts of the body, and any defect or lack of development is apt to throw the body out of line. Consequently posture is improved by eliminating any specific defect that may be present or by building up those muscles that are underdeveloped.

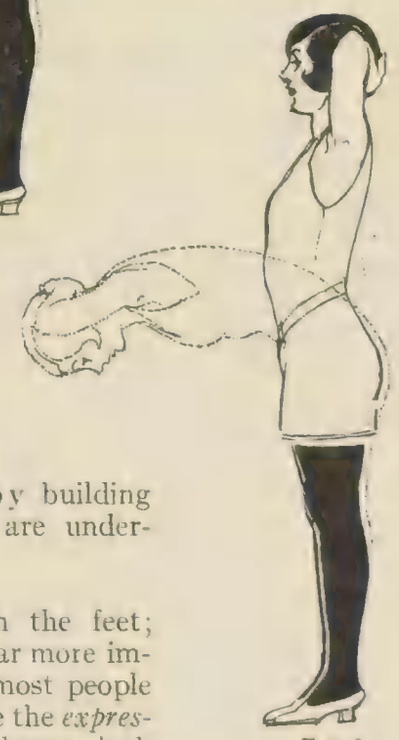

FIG. 8

POSTURE begins with the feet; and foot hygiene is far more important to health than most people realize. Flat foot may be the expression of muscular weakness, lack of exercise, improper foot-gear or faulty walking or standing. It may also be the cause of nervous disturbance, backache, fatigue, or joint pains in hip and knee as well as foot.

Flat foot is not primarily due, as many suppose, to weakness originating in the arch of the foot, but to weakness and poor development of the muscles in the fore part

THEY CALL IT "PEP"

When the football eleven trots briskly on to the field, when they rise again and again from a struggling heap and "at 'em" once more, don't you envy their unfailing vigor?

"Hurry-up" Yost has helped scores of football stars to acquire that perfect health which is the source of their "pep," and he says that one of the chief reasons for lack of "pep" in men and women is faulty elimination. Doctors and nutrition experts, too, warn us of the bad complexions, the tired feeling, headaches, and all kinds of ills caused by chronic constipation.

Take the first step toward "pep" by removing this cause. Our leaflet "Overcoming Constipation" gives you exercises that help to correct the ailment, and diet suggestions with a group of healthful menus. A letter to the Health Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., with a two-cent stamp for return postage, will bring it to you at once.

"I WISH I KNEW YOU"

one reader writes to Celia Caroline Cole. But you do know her—all of you who read her message to you each month!

She is just as enthusiastic and inspiring and just as glad to help you as she sounds in her articles. So don't hesitate to write her. If you want to know what to use for superfluous hair, for a sallow complexion, or any other beauty ill, C. C. C. will help you.

Just a note to the Beauty Editor, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, with a two-cent stamp for return postage will bring you her answer.

THERE is an inside to magazines that readers seldom think about. They see only pages and words marching along in an orderly fashion and inviting or exciting or enlightening pictures. But oh, there's something much more serious than those! Rooms with desks in them, and at the desks men and women who make the busy bee look like a dilettante and any earnest ruler of a nation as unresponsible as a humming-bird singing on a rose.

Editors. Trying to give all they can, tell all they know in an allotted space and tell it in a way you will want to read.

THE LETTERS ON THE LEFT FILLED US WITH DESPAIR

Now and then the beauty department discusses among itself, "I wonder what kind of picture would be nicest at the top of this article?" And then one picture always comes and stands before our mind—a distracted female with a flaming torch in each hand, and one torch is acne and the other is superfluous hair; and the distracted female is the beauty department.

And we nod our head and look at the huge pile of letters on the right and the still huger pile on the left, and while none of the neat piles of letters ranged in between bother us at all, the ones at the extreme ends fill us with despair. The huge pile on the right wants to be cured of acne, and the huger on the left, of superfluous hair.

And there is no general hundred per cent. cure for either.

Then we read some of the letters over again and have lumps in our throat at the humiliation and despair and fear of life in them, life that one naturally and rightly expects to find shining and joyous and deep—if not to-day, then to-morrow—but which turns out for some of us all wrong and dark because the only face one has to turn to it is spotted and scarred with acne or disfigured with hair.

Troubled by these letters, we decided a few weeks ago that while we couldn't develop acne and try out personally all the cures for that, we could, if we wanted to be really valuable as a beauty guide, take whatever fuzz we had and seek out superfluous hair places and see what they could do!

We knew that doctors approve, generally speaking, of electrolysis. But we found that one needs practically to have second sight to discern which electrolician knows his work well enough to get down to the very root and take out and not just break off. It takes a very good operator never to make a scar, and for fuzz it is not much good since there must be a separate operation for every single hair.

Other electric devices that we examined we found sometimes destroyed the tissues and left a brown lax skin in the effort to destroy the hair. In fact, in all the field of electricity there was only the reputable electrolician with a skilled needle that we would trust to separate us from whatever fuzz nature had overlooked. X-ray is dangerous and not to be used in connection with superfluous hair.

WHEN a hair is broken off, or you tweeze it out, two hairs are likely to come in its place. Superfluous hairs are like weeds in a garden, you have to break their spirit. You pull them out by the roots, and when they come back, you pull them out again, and even then they come back; but they are further apart and some of the weaker ones gone altogether. You pull them out again and again, and finally they decide to give up the ghost and disappear except a bold, stray one now and then. But they can be banished. What if you do have to repeat the process every five or six weeks? You remember what Billy Sunday said when somebody asked him if his conversions were permanent? "No. Neither is a bath." If it takes four weeks the first time to come back, it will take longer the next, and longer—and thinner—the next.

THEY NEARLY ALL HAVE FUZZ ON THEIR LEGS

Drawings by Gustaf Tenggren

YOU HAVE TO BREAK THEIR SPIRIT

Superfluous hair comes just because it does, like your nose or your eyes. You may be born that way; or you may inherit it; or it may come when it never did before at that most sensitive time in the lives of girls and women, the time of puberty and menopause; or it comes because nature sends it to protect the skin against unwonted heat or cold; English or American women who go to hot countries to live find that they have to fight superfluous hair, and those beautiful husky children of to-day walking around in midwinter with socks on and their pink little legs not seeming to care a whoop nearly all have fuzz on their legs. Nature, not so modern and chic as their mothers, has rushed to their rescue and given them a little fuzz to keep them warm.

There are all sorts of depilatories (hair removers) on the market, powders, lotions, many of them good, some not so good. A good depilatory is an excellent temporary relief. The time of the return varies with the individual; with some the hair will show slightly in a week, with others not for two weeks or more. Depilatories do not claim to remove permanently, but one can keep perfectly clean of superfluous hair by the regular application of a good powder or lotion. They are inexpensive and easily applied. The lotions may be applied with a brush or dampened absorbent cotton; if using the powder, pour a tablespoonful into a saucer, mix with water to form a paste, and spread the mixture on with a wooden spatula, which is generally supplied with the powder.

And then there is wax. We knew, of course, about waxes, but we don't like pain, anybody's, and the thought of people having large areas of hair jerked out by the roots always had made us squeeze our eyes tight shut and hurry past the places where they did such things. But if there really were two terrible torches burning the joy out of women's lives, and we could prove that one needn't burn, then we must.

So we went. We picked out the best known of all the waxes, and one bright, fearless morning, we took our face (on which we thought there was no fuzz) and our arms and our legs and under our arms and the back of our neck where the barber clips and leaves a shadow and sat ourself down in that House of Wax and said, "do everything that ought to be done, in one sitting. We wish to know the worst." (You see, we thought if we died of pain, at least we died for the Cause; and if we didn't die, we'd be entirely beautiful!)

A delightful woman came and ministered unto us. We talked philosophy, plays, books, music and life, while she deftly spread on the melted wax in neat little gardens like flower-beds with narrow paths in between; the paths were in order that she could get hold of the beds and lift them up and off.

A DELIGHTFUL WOMAN CAME AND MINISTERED UNTO US

SOULIÉ'S ORIGINAL DESIGNS SENT FROM THE BUTTERICK PARIS ESTABLISHMENT SHOW, BRIEFLY, THE FLARED AND STRAIGHT SILHOUETTES

Flying squirrel used after the new trimming fashion of long lines and small patches is employed by Soulié on a coat of black satin. It has one of the new higher collars and retains the straight silhouette

Paris puts the flare in its proper place—which may be before, behind, at the sides or all around. Soulié places it at the sides of a coat of gray cloth embroidered in self-color and trimmed with vison. With the new width the skirt must be short or the effect would be heavy and mature

A coat that suggests the new princess silhouette which is being used for both coats and frocks is designed by Soulié for rust-colored velvet embroidered with rust-colored silk and trimmed with gray fur

The flared silhouette is used mostly for the silks and Georgettes, the straight line for wool frocks, sports clothes and borders and for very elegant materials that should not be broken by seams. Soulié uses it for a frock of green velvet girdled with oxidized steel cords

A flared flounce that begins where the long body ends is used by Soulié on a frock of black velvet and white crêpe embroidered with white beads which give the new much seamed effect. Sleeves are almost always long, while necks are frequently higher with new and interesting collars

36 bust requires 1¼ yard 54-inch bordered crêpe satin, with 1¼ yard 54-inch matching crêpe satin (using shiny side for sleeves, dull side for collar, tie and godets).

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

36 bust requires 4 yards 39-inch silk brocade.

The dress is charming for ladies 32 to 46 bust.

6399—Its youthfulness obtains for this separate bolero an immediate entrée into Fashion. The slip-over dress with its straight gathered skirt attached at a low waistline is a lovely style for lace, or for Georgette, crêpe de Chine or crêpe satin with lace edging; or crêpe satin with vestee of tucked contrasting Georgette, etc. It may have a drop skirt. Lower edge of skirt 1¾ yard.

36 bust requires 3 yards 28-inch lace flouncing and 2⅞ yards 39-inch Georgette.

The dress is attractive for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

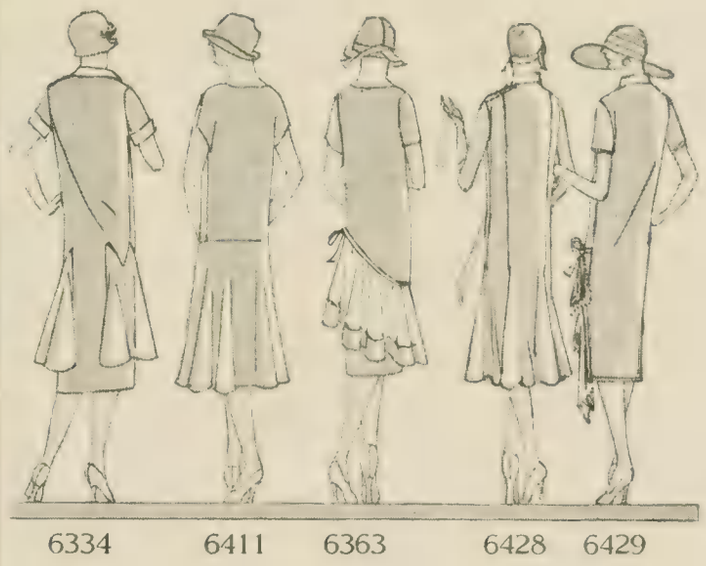
6413—10342—For Georgette one looks for something softly gathered. The gathered section attached across the back and sides of this frock is straight. The dress has a one-piece front. It slips on over the head and fits closely at the hipline. Crêpe de Chine, crêpe satin or soft satin of one material with matching fringe, is also smart for this frock. The embroidery is charming. Work in one-stitch. Lower edge 61½ inches.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 36-inch soft satin.

The dress is smart for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6405—10961—When a flare goes back on a frock, the one-piece front remains straight and slender. The scalloped outline in which this circular flare is attached across the back and sides makes an attractive joining. Make this slip-over frock of crêpe satin, satin Canton, satin faille, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, heavy crêpe de Chine, etc., with contrasting crêpe de Chine, etc. It fits closely at the hipline. The touch of embroidery is attractive. Work in contrast. Lower edge 2¼ yards.

36 bust requires 2¼ yards 54-inch flat crêpe (flare cut crosswise).



The dress is attractive for ladies 32 to 46 bust.

SAFETY FIRST!

The princess style is a new and charming and very smart one. But a frock is only as smart as its fit is perfect, and perfect fit depends first upon true size.

While this is so of every garment, it is particularly true of the new and lovely princess fashions. Their great beauty of line and cut may be lost if the wrong size is purchased and needless alterations made. For this style—as, indeed, for all—the importance of being measured can not be too strongly emphasized.

Are you sure you take a 36? It's safer to be measured!

6334—10321—Side circular flares attached in pointed outline are new. The embroidery on the smart long sleeve is effective. Work in one-stitch. This one-piece slip-over dress fits closely at the hipline. Use satin Canton, satin faille, etc., with contrasting crêpe de Chine or Georgette; broché crêpe faille or broché crêpe satin with harmonizing Georgette or crêpe de Chine, etc. Lower edge 43½ inches.

36 bust requires 2¾ yards 54-inch crêpe satin and ½ yard 35-inch contrasting.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6363—10355—The attractive straight gathered flounce climbs to hip height. For this slip-over one-piece dress, close fitting at the hipline, use crêpe satin, satin faille, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, etc.. The embroidery is attractive. Work in contrast. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 2⅞ yards 39-inch satin Canton and 1¼ yard 39-inch Georgette for the flounce, etc.

The dress is excellent style for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6411—The droop of the circular flare attached across back and sides and the soft shoulder-line of the smart close sleeve give grace to this slip-over dress. It fits closely at the hipline and has a one-piece front. Use crêpe satin, satin Canton, satin faille, soft satin, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, crêpe de Chine, crêpe Roma, Georgette, broché crêpe satin, broché crêpe faille, etc. Lower edge 2⅝ yards.

36 bust requires 3⅞ yards 39-inch silk brocade (circular flare cut crosswise).

The dress is smart for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6428—Fashion presents a new silhouette! The princess line, flaring below, is very slightly fitted above to suggest the line of the figure. This slip-over dress may have a round neck. For evening wear the armhole is cut down and the neck cut lower. Use satin Canton, plain satin, satin faille, crêpe faille, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine, etc., with collar facing, etc., of ribbon. Lower edge 2¼ yards.

36 bust requires 3⅜ yards 39-inch crêpe satin.

The princess dress is for ladies 32 to 48 bust.

6429—The tie-around dress, draped and shirred at the closing, is a new arrival from Paris. The long close sleeve that comes down on the hand is extremely smart. The dress is one-piece in type and may have a body lining. Use heavy crêpe de Chine, broché crêpe satin, etc., with harmonizing Georgette; or chiffon velvet with matching Georgette. It may be made with a short sleeve.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 40-inch crêpe satin, with 1¼ yard 39-inch Georgette.

The dress is charming for ladies 36 to 48 bust.

WHEN the days arrive that are frosty in the morning and summer-like at noon, the wool or velvet frock appears on the street and at restaurants without the burdensome accompaniment of a coat. With a small hat, smart gloves and shoes, a scarf or fox fur, it has very great style. One of the newest of these costumes is the two-piece type—a long slender blouse and a matching slip. It may be straight, tailored and made of wool, or rather more formal in cut and made of silk. A wool one of novelty woven fabric is smart for sports and general wear; a silk or velvet one with a flared slip is better style for afternoons.

Wool frocks pin their faith mainly to plaits for chic, but silk frocks take naturally to flares. There is one silk dress that renounces both and turns instead to flying loose panels.

SMART Autumn fabrics include such wool materials as the always popular twill, worsteds, cashmere, light-weight kasha, camel's-hair twill, wool crêpe, tweeds, etc. For silk frocks there are the various satins—plain satin, crêpe satin, broché crêpe satin, satin Canton and satin faille—and all the crêpes including flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, silk crêpe, etc.

THE evening mode flies and flutters. At the slightest movement soft, down-drooping draperies lift in quivering flight, a plaited godet opens out fanlike but to close again, flares ripple forward outspread and swing back in retreat, now advancing, now receding, now appearing, now lost to sight!

THE evening frock that is correct for the theater, dinners or small dances is characterized by a youthful simplicity. It trims itself with its own material with perhaps a bit of metallic ribbon at its waistline and a flower on its shoulder. Its lightness and animation are best expressed by the most delicate fabrics—chiffon, chiffon voile, Georgette, crêpe de Chine and crêpe Roma. But for formal evening wear Paris is advocating frocks of greater elegance, greater dignity and using gorgeous materials, rich embroideries and rare laces. Brocades of various kinds are favored, especially velvet brocades on a sheer ground such as chiffon or Georgette, also the satin and metallic brocades. Bordered chenile brocade on Georgette or voile is new. Velvet, crêpe satin, satin, embroidered or beaded Georgette, wide lace flouncing, crêpe Roma, crêpe de Chine, etc., are also fashionable.

THE SMART AND SIMPLE ANNALS OF YOUTHFUL DRESS, FROM BABY FROCK TO PARTY CLOTHES

6418—Very French is the slip-over dress with a yoke and an inverted plait at each side front and back. Use twills, etc., with white linen or rep for the collar and cuffs, which may be detachable; or wool crêpe, etc.

12 years requires 2 yards 54-inch serge.

It is for juniors and girls 6 to 15.

6414—It's lots of fun to make a little slip-over dress with a straight lower edge and separate bloomers! Use silk or cotton Georgette, cotton voile, fine cotton crêpe, etc.

5 years requires 2¼ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine (all of one material).

The dress is for little girls 2 to 6.

6333—Twills, flannels, wool crêpe, serge, etc., striped with plain to match or plain with contrasting will make this charming one-piece dress that slips on over the head and runs its tab through a slash.

12 years requires 1½ yard 54-inch wool check.

It is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6329—5904—The bolero effect by band trimming is new for a little slip-over one-piece frock. Use serge, etc. The hat has a four-gored crown.

8 years requires 1¼ yard 54-inch twill for dress.

The dress is for girls 6 to 10 years; hat for girls 2 to 12 years.

6392—10232—An adorable little frock for a baby boy or baby girl! The lower edge is straight. Fine embroidery trims it. Work in eyelets. Use lawn, nainsook, etc., with Val. lace.

1 year requires 1⅜ yard 36-inch batiste.

The dress is for little girls and tiny boys ½ to 3 years.

6341—10321—Embroidery is a lovely trimming for this slip-over frock. Work in contrast. The circular flare across each side gives a graceful line. Use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, etc.

13 years requires 2⅞ yards 39-inch silk crêpe.

It is for juniors and girls 8 to 15.

6416—A very smart frock has a quaint basque effect. The Georgette flowers are easily made. For this one-piece slip-over dress with a straight lower edge use radium, etc.

13 years requires 2¼ yards 35-inch taffeta.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6406—10131—An embroidered morning-glory blooms on this simple slip-over dress. Work in color. The bloomers are separate.

5 years requires 1½ yard 35-inch velvet for dress and 1 yard 39-inch crêpe de Chine for bloomers, etc.

It is for little girls 2 to 6 years.

Butterick Patterns with the Deltor Picture Instructions for Cutting, Putting Together and Finishing may be purchased at leading stores throughout the world, at prices given on page 102.

STYLE IS WRITTEN IN TWO LINES—FLARED AND STRAIGHT

6401—Good style, good taste and good tailoring meet in this one-piece slip-over dress. It fits closely at the hipline and a plait is inserted at each side front and back. Use worsteds, cashmere, serge, wool crêpe, kasha, camel's-hair twills, etc. The lower edge is straight. Lower edge, plaits drawn out, 2 yards.

36 bust requires 2⅛ yards 54-inch twill and ⅝ yard 54-inch contrasting.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6395—Smarter than ever is the Chanel neck for slip-over frocks. This one-piece dress is particularly nice for borders in twills, serge, wool crêpe, flannel or wool taffeta, or half-and-half wools with plain to match, etc. It fits closely at hipline and has a straight lower edge.

36 bust requires 2⅛ yards 54-inch bordered wool. Lower edge 44½ inches.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust, also misses.

6425—The cape-back coat-frock, buttoning all the way down the front, is smart for street wear, for traveling, etc. The circular cape may be detachable. Use tweeds, mixtures, homespun, twills, worsteds, cashmere, serge, wool crêpe, kasha, camel's-hair twill, checks, etc.

36 bust requires 2½ yards 24-inch mannish weave and ¾ yard 40-inch contrast. Lower edge 44½ inches.

The coat dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust, also misses.

6373—10272—For ease as well as for chic a plait is inserted at the front of this slip-over one-piece dress. Embroidery makes it even more attractive. Work in color. Use flannel, heavy crêpe de Chine, pongee, etc. The lower edge is straight.

Lower edge, plait out, 54 inches.

19 years or 36 bust requires 2¼ yards 54-inch light-weight wool jersey.

It is for ladies 38 40 bust, also misses 15 to 20 yrs.

6435—Flares are attached in many outlines, but none of them is more attractive than the scalloped one. The circular skirt of this slip-over dress is cut in two pieces. The dress fits closely at the hipline and is made of crêpe satin, satin Canton, satin faille, flat crêpe, etc.

36 bust requires 3⅜ yards 39-inch silk crêpe (circular skirt cut crosswise to avoid piecin). Lower edge 2⅞ yards.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6348—The back flare is a boon to the figure that curves in the rear. This slip-over dress has a straight one-piece front and a circular flare attached across the back. Use satin with silk crêpe, ribbed silks or heavy silk crêpe with satin—in self or harmonizing color; or twills, worsteds, etc. Lower edge 1¾ yard.

36 bust requires 3 yards 39-inch novelty silk.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 48 bust.

Butterick Patterns with the Deltor Picture Instructions for Cutting, Putting Together and Finishing may be purchased at leading stores throughout the world, at prices given on page 102.

THE ENSEMBLE VOGUE IN PRACTICAL VEIN OR MORE FORMAL MODE

Dress 6379 6370

6370—6379—A smart ensemble costume puts a straight-line coat with pockets on the outside or on the lining over a simple one-piece slip-over frock. For the coat use tweeds, cashmere cheviots, novelty weaves or camel's-hair, etc. The dress and coat lining are of plain or plaid flannel in a harmonizing color. Lower edge of coat 47 inches.

36 bust requires 2⅜ yards 54-inch mannish weave for coat.

The coat is for ladies 33 to 48 bust, also misses; the dress is for ladies 32 to 50 bust.

6372—6401—The shoulder yoke in one with the sleeve is one interesting style feature of this coat. Another is that, for certain figures, there need be no underarm seams if the material is wide. Use fabric fur, smooth-faced plain coatings or velvet with silk crêpe for lining and for the one-piece dress, etc. Lower edge of coat 45 inches.

36 bust requires 2¼ yards 54-inch fur cloth for coat.

The coat is for ladies 33 to 44 bust. also misses; the dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6426—"Paris" is stamped on this one-piece dress by the smart saddle shoulder, the high neck, the inverted plaits at each side front and back, and the puff sleeve. The dress slips on over the head and may be made of worsteds, cashmere, kasha, camel's-hair twills, serge, wool crêpe, etc., with harmonizing satin; or use crêpe satin, etc.

19 years or 36 bust requires 2½ yards 54-inch twill and ⅝ yard 35-inch contrasting. Lower edge with plaits drawn out 2⅛ yards.

The dress is smart for ladies 38 and 40 bust; misses 15 to 20 years.

6372 Dress 6401

6368—6350—Under the straight lines of this coat there is an aproned slip-over frock quite as smart! For coat use short-nap or novelty coatings, kasha, etc. The pocket may be a patch pocket on the lining.

36 bust requires 2⅞ yards 50-inch velvet for coat. Lower edge of coat 47 inches.

The coat is for ladies 33 to 52 bust, also misses; dress for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6434—Bordered wide crêpe satin, Canton crêpe or satin and faille or 54-inch ombré velvet, etc., makes this simple one-piece dress and Georgette makes the soft sleeves. It slips on over the head, fits closely at the hipline and has a straight lower edge. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 1½ yard 54-inch bordered silk and ⅞ yard 39-inch Georgette.

The dress is very attractive for ladies 32 to 44 bust, also misses.

6361—6358—The flare front coat is made of broadcloth, kasha, kasha duvetyn, camel's-hair, etc. The coat-dress is particularly suited to it and both coat and dress may be made without band trimming.

36 bust requires 3¼ yards 54-inch mannish weave. Lower edge of coat 1¾ yard.

The coat is for ladies 32 to 48 bust; dress for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

STRAIGHT, FLARED OR PRINCESS LINES FOR COATS AND A PRINCESS COAT-DRESS

6439—Newest in wraps is the lovely princess coat with its flared underarm gore. There is a pocket on the lining. Use velvet, kasha, smooth-faced plain coatings or coatings in novelty weave; or use ribbed silks, etc., lined with kasha.

36 bust requires 3 yards 54-inch short-nap coating. Lower edge 1⅞ yard.

The princess coat is for ladies 32 to 48 bust, also misses.

6431—The softness of a crushed collar is universally becoming! It is smart, as well, on this straight-line fabric fur coat. The pocket is on the lining. Velvet, short-nap coatings, smooth faced plain coatings, kasha, novelty coatings or ottoman weaves may also be used; or satin, etc., lined with kasha. Lower edge 47 inches.

36 bust requires 3⅜ yards 50-inch fur cloth.

The coat is for ladies 32 to 48 bust, also misses.

6438—One button fastens this coat in front in straight-line style—or it may be worn wrapped around and held. The circular flare, attached across the back, dips in an oval outline. The lining has a pocket. Use velvet, kasha, smooth-faced plain coatings, coatings in novelty weaves, etc.

36 bust requires 2⅝ yards 54-inch short-nap coating. Lower edge 1⅞ yard.

The coat is for ladies 32 to 46 bust, also misses.

6440—Fashion finds a decidedly new line in the princess coat dress. It has a flared underarm gore and fits closely at the hipline. Use worsteds, cashmere, wool poplin, serge, wool crêpe, kasha or camel's-hair twills with contrasting ribbon tie; or heavy satin or heavy silk crêpe with facing on tie of contrasting ribbon. Lower edge 2 yards.

36 bust requires 2¼ yards 54-inch twill.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 48 bust

6430—Brilliant-colored evening wraps are very smart. Use brocades or, for a practical wrap suitable with any evening dress, use black velvet or heavy satin lined with silver cloth, gray crêpe de Chine or satin. This coat wrap has a deep armhole and may be worn wrapped around or in straight-line style.

36 bust requires 2⅞ yards 50-inch brocade.

It is for ladies 32 to 44 bust, also misses.

6436—Coats, also, find charm in the circular flare that is attached across the front in an outline of points. The collar may close up snugly. Use short-nap coatings, kasha, smooth-faced plain coatings, coatings in novelty weaves or fabric fur, etc. The pocket is on the lining. Lower edge 2 yards.

36 bust requires 3⅞ yards 39-inch velvet.

The coat is for ladies 32 to 44 bust, also misses.

6437—There is distinction in the long tuxedo collar of this coat. Use short-nap coatings, kasha, smooth-faced plain coatings, coatings in novelty weaves, fabric fur, with fur or fabric fur collar, etc. It is worn in straight-line style or wrapped around. The pocket is on the lining.

36 bust requires 3⅞ yards 39-inch velvet and ¾ yard 50-inch fabric fur. Lower edge 47 ins.

The coat is for ladies 32 to 44 bust, also misses.

6422—10138—Rippling softly, the two-piece circular skirt of this slip-over frock attaches itself at a close-fitting hipline. The embroidery is smart. Work in contrast. Use satin Canton, plain satin, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, satin faille, heavy crêpe de Chine, etc. Lower edge 3 yards.

36 bust requires 2⅜ yards 54-inch crêpe satin and ½ yard 35-inch contrasting material.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

36 bust requires 4 yards 39-inch Georgette.

The dress is for ladies 36 to 52 bust.

6427—6359—10356—Lightness and animation are given to this one-piece slip-over frock by shirred godets. Color is supplied by embroidery. Work in contrast. Use crêpe satin or heavy crêpe de Chine; or satin faille, flat crêpe, etc. It fits closely at the hipline. For the smart six-gored-crown hat use satin, etc. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 4¾ yards 39-inch satin Canton.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust; hat for ladies and misses.

6340—To be dull is to be interesting when the dull side of satin Canton, satin faille, etc., is lightened by godets of the shiny side inserted in the front of a one-piece dress that fits the hipline closely. The separate vestee of crêpe de Chine, etc., is on a lining.

36 bust requires 2⅞ yards 39-inch crêpe satin (dull and shiny sides) and ¾ yard 39-inch contrasting for vestee and cuffs. Lower edge 1⅞ yard.

The dress is for ladies 34 to 48 bust.

6433—10371—Embroidery creates a jabot effect. Work in one-stitch. The smart circular flounce of this slip-over frock is attached in an outline of deep points. Use crêpe satin, satin Canton, plain satin, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe Roma, satin faille, crêpe de Chine, Georgette, chiffon velvet, etc. Lower edge 2¾ yards.

36 bust requires 2⅜ yards 54-inch silk crêpe.

The dress is for ladies 36 to 52 bust.

6379—For borders there must be a straight lower edge. This slip-over one-piece dress is smart for bordered light-weight flannel with a harmonizing crêpe de Chine collar, or light-weight wool jersey, etc., with contrasting or with white linen; or flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine, etc. The collar and cuffs may be detachable.

36 bust requires 2⅛ yards 56-inch bordered flannel. Lower edge 48 inches.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 50 bust.

OLD ROMANCES, FAIRY TALES AND MOTHER GOOSE RHYMES SEND REPRESENTATIVES TO THE COSTUME BALL

6386—One believes in fairies and believes them to be quite charming when meeting them at parties. A fairy or butterfly costume in white or pastel colors is made of tarlatan or cotton net. Silver-leaf covers the wand, makes wing dots, stars, etc.

The costume is for juniors and girls 2 to 15 years.

5613—10288—This witch wears a slip-over one-piece dress, a circular cape and a tall hat. Use gray sateen or cotton lining material costume with orange moons, black cats, etc. The figures are amusing. Work in patchwork. Lower edge 53 inches.

The costume is for misses, ladies and girls 26 to 40 bust.

4785—Pierrot, pouring out his heart in sentimental serenade, is a fascinating figure in black-and-white satin with a becoming ruff of maline. The costume may also be made of sateen, silesia or paper muslin with a tarlatan ruff.

The Pierrot costume is for men or boys 28 to 44 breast.

5522—A Dutch peasant costume with its becoming bonnet is quaint for fancy dress. Make it of blue checked or striped gingham with white cotton voile kerchief, apron and bonnet; or use Dutch blue sateen, etc.

The costume is for girls, misses and ladies 24 to 38 bust.

3326—A burnt-orange body with brown bands, yellow wings and green, lavender and brown spots makes a lovely butterfly. Although it looks elaborate it is easily made of paper muslin, lining China silk, messaline, etc., with tarlatan, etc., wings.

The costume is for misses, ladies and girls 24 to 38 bust.

This cunning Tommy Tiptoe suit is for 4 to 12 years.

3555—A ballet dress could turn into a Pierrette costume with very little effort. Make it of paper muslin, taffeta, gold tissue, pineapple cloth, tarlatan or coarse cotton net, with sateen, satin or taffeta waist. For Pierette, add a ruff of tarlatan or net.

This costume is for girls, misses and ladies 24 to 38 bust.

5398—The Pierrette costume may have a slightly shorter leg. Use paper muslin, sateen, cambric or silesia, with tarlatan ruff; or use satin, taffeta, gold tissue or pineapple cloth, with a maline ruff, etc. The wool or silk pompons are easily made.

The costume is for misses, ladies and girls 26 to 38 bust.

6421—When the music starts, a rosebud strays in from the garden. Rose red are her petals, green the bodice and calyx and green the shoes and stockings. Make this charming rose costume of cambric, tarlatan, taffeta or radium.

The rose costume is for girls and misses 24 to 37 bust.

"How I put beauty into my room —with Valspar" by Joy Gann

Five hundred dollars! That's the generous prize Miss Joy Gann won in the Room-Beautifying Contest held recently by the U. S. Department of Agriculture.

The contest was part of the splendid "Own Your Own Room" movement, sponsored by the Department of Agriculture to help improve living conditions in America. For some time the Department has been actively engaged in organizing Room-Improvement Clubs all over the country and in arranging Club Programs and practical demonstrations.

Miss Gann worked a veritable transformation in her room. Before she began, the walls had been whitewashed, the woodwork was green, the floor and furniture were shabby and worn.

She decided on Ivory and Mahogany as the color scheme she wanted. First she painted the walls a light orange. Then the ceiling was finished in cream, after which she was ready to tackle the floor and furniture.

"After washing the floor," writes Miss Gann, "I gave it a thick coat of Mahogany Valspar Varnish-Stain, and after I finished all the other work in the room, I gave it a final coat of Valspar.

"Although the room has been in almost constant use for two years and it has been necessary to wash the floor any number of times, it is still in splendid condition.

"The single bed and straight chair, upon which I also used Mahogany Valspar, have the same glossy, unscarred finish they had directly after I applied the varnish.

"I am glad to give this information to you and hope that because of my success some other girl may decide to use Valspar in her room."

Clear Valspar-Varnish gives a rich, lustrous finish to woodwork, without changing its color. Valspar may be rubbed down to a dull satin finish if desired.

Valspar Varnish-Stain changes the color of the wood and at the same time brings out the full beauty of the grain, giving natural wood effects in Light or Dark Oak, Walnut, Mahogany, Cherry, and Moss Green. May also be rubbed to a satin finish.

Valspar-Enamels cover the surface with solid colors like paint but have a high lustre and gloss. They come in Red—light and deep, Blue—light, medium and deep, Green—medium and deep, Vermilion, Ivory, Bright Yellow, Gray and Brown. Also in Black, White, Gold, Bronze, Aluminum, and Flat Black. Any desired shade may be obtained by mixing. Valspar Enamels when rubbed down produce any desired degree of satin or semi-gloss finish.

Cheese Balls

1 cup American cheese grated
¼ cup ground bread crumbs
1 egg
¼ teaspoon Worcestershire Sauce
¼ teaspoon salt

Separate the egg. Mix the bread crumbs with the yolk. Add the cheese, salt and Worcestershire Sauce. Fold in the stiffly beaten white. Shape into balls and roll each in bread crumbs before frying, or simply drop by spoonful into deep hot Crisco (375° F.). Fry until delicately brown. Drain on soft paper and serve hot. This makes 8 cheese balls.

Vegetable Croquettes

with Cheese Sauce

2 cups potatoes, riced or mashed
1 cup cooked green peas, fresh or canned
1 cup diced carrots, cooked fresh bread crumbs Beaten egg
2 teaspoons cream 1 teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon Worcestershire Sauce

Be sure peas and carrots have been thoroughly drained of all water. Mix potatoes with a fork. Add salt and Worcestershire Sauce; then the cream. Mix thoroughly together with a fork. Shape into croquettes of any size or form you like. Dip in beaten egg, then in bread crumbs. Drop in hot Crisco, 375° to 385° F. (or when a piece of bread browns in 40 seconds). Cook until brown. Drain on soft paper and serve hot with cheese sauce.

Cheese Sauce:

2 tablespoons flour 1 tablespoon Crisco
½ cup grated cheese 1 cup milk
¼ teaspoon salt
Dash of Worcestershire Sauce

Blend flour and Crisco together in saucepan over fire. Add milk. Bring to boil over fire, stirring until smooth. Then stir in cheese and salt. Add Worcestershire Sauce.

Sweet Potato Puffs

4 medium sized sweet potatoes
1 egg, well beaten Bread crumbs
½ teaspoon salt Dash pepper

Boil potatoes until soft. Peel and put through the ricer. Add salt, pepper and egg. Cool. Drop teaspoonful into grated bread crumbs. Toss with fork or fingers until covered, then drop into hot Crisco, 385° to 395° F. or when a piece of bread browns in 20 seconds, until brown, about two minutes.

This amount will serve 4 to 6 people.

Crisp, wholesome without from the deep kettle

I HAVE learned to fry, in the deep kettle, many things which I had never thought of frying before. When the old question, "What shall I have for dinner?" comes up, I often find the answer in the deep kettle.

Naturally when it comes to deep frying the most important ingredient is the fat, and I am going to tell you why I prefer Crisco.

In the first place, Crisco fries the food to perfection before it is hot enough to smoke. So you see there will be no smoke in your kitchen or the rest of the house, and none to smell up your hair and clothes.

Another thing, Crisco instantly forms a crisp brown crust around the outside of the food.

Crisco is odorless too, and it does not carry the taste of one food to another, so the same Crisco may be used over and over again for frying different things.

The old saying "When a fat is used for fish, it must be kept for fish" does not apply to Crisco. When you use Crisco, you need keep only one kettle of fat for frying everything. After frying, simply strain out any possible crumbs and reheat it for whatever you want to fry next time whether it be fish, doughnuts, croquettes, or what not.

All the foods you see on this left-hand page I fried in Crisco, in my deep kettle.

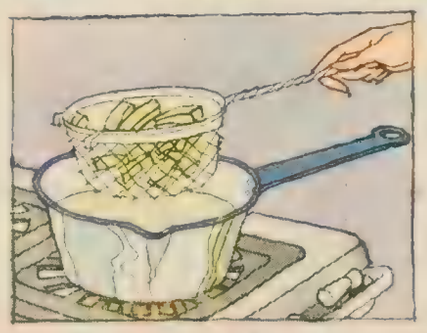
Fried Carrots

Carrots cooked this way are delicious to serve with roasts and add variety to winter menus. Crisco frying gives them a lovely combination of brown and orange.

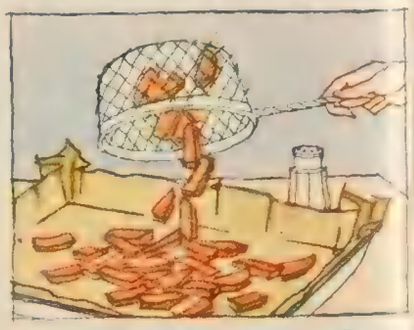
Take cold boiled carrots. Cut off small round end and split lengthwise. Cut larger part into quarters. Dip in cold milk. Roll in flour. Drop in hot Crisco, 385° to 395° F. (or when a piece of bread browns in 20 seconds) and fry until brown. Drain on soft paper. Sprinkle with salt and serve hot.



Apple Fritters

2 cups pastry flour
1 teaspoon baking powder
1 teaspoon sugar ¼ teaspoon salt
1 tablespoon melted Crisco
3 eggs ½ cup milk 6 ripe apples

Peel and core apples. Cut in quarters.



Beat eggs, add Crisco, then milk, then all dry ingredients sifted together. Dip each piece of apple in the batter and fry until soft in deep kettle of Crisco heated to 375° to 385° F. (or when a small piece of bread browns in 40 seconds).

French Fried Potatoes—as quick as broiling a steak

1. All you need to deep fry is an ordinary saucepan, a strainer and a 3 pound can of Crisco. Put your Crisco into a cold pan and heat slowly. When a piece of bread browns in 20 seconds your Crisco is ready for frying potatoes. Don't wait for Crisco to smoke.

2. Fill your strainer half full of potatoes and lower it into the Crisco. Increase the heat as the cold potatoes naturally cool the Crisco a little.

3. When brown lift strainer out of the fat, shake lightly, drain the potatoes on brown paper and sprinkle with salt.

4. When you have finished, strain your Crisco back into the can and set it aside to cool. Then it is ready to use over and over again for anything you want to fry. The taste of one thing will not be carried to another.

Apple Griddle Cakes
(recipe at right)

fried foods smoke or odor

from the frying pan

MANY women, I find, have discontinued pan frying entirely because of the unpleasant results caused by smoking fat. This was my first experience but after I found Crisco, I learned to fry all over again.

By using enough Crisco to partly cover the food and by cooking it slowly, I find that the food will be thoroughly cooked without being scorched. Many people make the mistake of constantly turning the food while it is frying. It should be more than half cooked from the bottom, before it is turned to cook the other side.

We fry food in Crisco, not with it. The Crisco fries the outside instantly, forming a crisp brown crust which prevents the fat soaking through. Therefore, when food is fried in plenty of Crisco and turned only once, it is beautifully fried with a crisp brown outside and thoroughly cooked inside.

After finishing one fry with Crisco, we simply strain it back and use it again for anything we want to fry.

The griddle cakes and omelet you see on this page were fried in Crisco by this method. They were perfect and tasted as good as they look. They were photographed in their natural colors just as they came out of my frying pan. If you will save these recipes and try them, with Crisco, I know that you will get results which are just as good looking and just as delicious as mine are.

W. S. C.

How to fry without smoke

1. Put Crisco into cold frying pan. To thoroughly cook the food (for example, a fish) without smoke or scorching, fry slowly, using enough Crisco to partly cover it. It will not require the constant attention frying does when only a little fat is used.

2. Put frying pan over low heat. As soon as Crisco is melted put in a small piece of bread. As soon as bread starts to brown put in the fish.

3. Cook slowly until fish is nearly done, then turn to brown the other side. With plenty of Crisco in the pan the fish is easily turned without breaking, if you wait until it is almost done.

4. Strain the Crisco into an empty can and use it for the next things you want to fry. No one will know you have fried fish in it.

Apple Griddle Cakes

2 cups bread broken in pieces
2 cups hot milk 2 eggs separated
1 cup flour 1 tablespoon Crisco
2 teaspoons baking powder
1 tablespoon sugar ½ teaspoon salt
1 cup chopped ripe apples

Soak bread and milk together over night or until soft. Then rub to a paste. Add Crisco, sugar and salt; then egg yolks, beaten until light. Add flour and baking powder sifted together. Fold in stiffly beaten egg whites. Stir apples into batter with fork. Drop by spoonfuls on Criscoed griddle. Cook until partly done and then turn and finish cooking. Turn only once.

French Pancakes

2 eggs 1 cup milk 1 cup flour
2 teaspoons baking powder
1 teaspoon salt Jelly
1 tablespoon melted Crisco

Beat eggs light. Add Crisco and milk. Sift flour, salt and baking powder together. Add and beat smooth. Grease griddle with Crisco using about as much as you would to grease a cake pan. When hot, drop spoonfuls of batter on griddle. Cook until nearly done, then turn and finish on the other side.

Put on plate, spread with jelly, roll and dust with powdered sugar. This makes ten pancakes.

Delicious Cakes, Flaky Pastry, Fluffy Biscuits, too

I not only fry in Crisco, but I do all my cooking with it for it delightfully answers every shortening purpose.

I can always depend on Crisco for tender flaky pie crusts, delicious cakes with a fine, tender, even texture, cookies, bread, biscuits, and desserts of every kind. In fact, I use no other shortening, for Crisco gives just the right amount of richness without changing the natural flavor of the food.

Another reason why I like Crisco so much is that it keeps fresh indefinitely without refrigeration.

Tomato Omelet

4 eggs, separated 4 tablespoons water
½ teaspoon salt 1 small can tomatoes
Crisco

Cook tomatoes until thick. Season to taste.

Beat egg yolks light. Add salt and water. Beat whites until stiff and fold into beaten yolks. Put enough Crisco into frying pan to cover bottom, when melted. When it is hot, put in mixture and cook slowly until nearly done. Then place in a slow oven at about 350° F. until omelet is dry on top. Remove, spread the stewed tomatoes over half the omelet, fold over and turn onto a platter. This amount will serve 3 people. (If you prefer, use fresh tomatoes cut in slices and fried until soft.)

New!
a seeded raisin that isn't sticky

Now try her cake with Puffed Sun-Maids

"So much easier to make, and better with these new raisins," says Belle De Graf

CLIPPED from some magazine and pasted in your cook book among the good things to make with raisins, there is probably a recipe for a wonderful cake by Mrs. Belle De Graf. Perhaps this very one:

2 cups seeded raisins
½ cup butter or substitute
1¼ cups sugar
3 eggs
3 cups sifted flour
3 teaspoons baking powder
½ teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon nutmeg
¾ teaspoon cinnamon
¼ teaspoon cloves
¼ teaspoon mace

Pour water over raisins and set aside to cool; drain, saving water.

Cream butter and gradually add sugar until thoroughly creamed. Add eggs well beaten. Sift flour again, with baking powder, salt and spices. Dredge raisins with a portion of flour. Add rest of flour and raisin water alternately to mixture, beating well between each addition. Fold in floured raisins and pour into paper lined pan. Bake 1¼ to 1½ hours in moderate oven (360° F.). If tube pan is used, bake 1 to 1¼ hours.

When cool, cover with a Boiled White Icing made with ¾ cup of seeded raisins, cut, or the following Uncooked Butter Frosting:

Cream 4 tablespoons butter, 1 cup powdered sugar, 1 tablespoon orange juice. Beat white of one egg. Add ¾ to 1 cup powdered sugar. Combine the two mixtures. Add ¾ cup seeded raisins which have been cut, steamed 10 minutes and cooled. Add powdered sugar until frosting will spread but not run.

Not too expensive, simple enough—yet perhaps you haven't used it often just because, like many other festive dishes, it calls for seeded raisins. And you have never had seeded raisins that were really easy to use! Always there has been the bother of picking them apart.

$2,400.00 IN CASH PRIZES.

Can you make a better Raisin Cake than this? If you can you have a fine chance to win in Sun-Maid's unique Raisin Cookery contest. Send coupon now for complete information.

But just try this cake with Puffed Sun-Maids! "It is so much easier to make now—and better," says Mrs. De Graf.

Never before in seeded raisins such flavor! Such convenience!

For, in Puffed Sun-Maids, a way has been found to keep seeded raisins from sticking together—a way, moreover, which retains all the nectar that Nature stores in the big white Muscat grapes from which these raisins are made.

By an exclusive Sun-Maid process the seeds are extracted without crushing the raisins or causing the juice to run, as in ordinary seeded raisins.

Hence, Puffed Sun-Maids are larger, plumper. And they are more savory because they retain more of the natural fruit sugar.

Being whole raisins, untorn, they "stay up" in the batter far better than ordinary seeded raisins.

And it's so easy to use Puffed Sun-Maids. They are not sticky to handle, but separate easily as they come out of the package. You can whisk them right into your batter!

Puffed Sun-Maids cost no more

Ask your grocer for a package of Puffed Sun-Maids today. They cost no more. For pies and cakes and puddings; for breads and sauces and candies, you will find them the best and most convenient seeded raisins you ever used.

Also the finest* seedless *raisins

Just as the Sun-Maid Raisin Growers of California now offer you the perfect seeded raisins so do they supply the finest seedless raisins, clean, uniform, full-flavored.

In buying Sun-Maids—Puffed in the blue carton, Seedless in the red carton—you get the product of these 17,000 co-operating California growers who for years have set the raisin quality standard of the world.

All Around You People Know This Secret—

Clear eyes, strong bodies, a new zest in living—all through one simple food

NOT a "cure-all," not a medicine in any sense—Fleischmann's Yeast is simply a remarkable fresh food.

The millions of tiny active yeast plants in every cake invigorate the whole system. They aid digestion—clear the skin—banish the poisons of constipation. Where cathartics give only temporary relief, yeast strengthens the intestinal muscles and makes them healthy and active. And day by day it releases new stores of energy.

Eat two or three cakes regularly every day before meals: on crackers—in fruit juices or milk—or just plain. For constipation especially, dissolve one cake in hot water (not scalding) before breakfast and at bedtime. Buy several cakes at a time—they will keep fresh in a cool dry place for two or three days. All grocers have Fleischmann's Yeast. Start eating it today!

And let us send you a free copy of our latest booklet on Yeast for Health. Health Research Dept. C-22, The Fleischmann Company, 701 Washington Street, New York.

"About 15 months ago I was afflicted with sties. I had suffered from constipation for several years. One day I noticed dark spots appearing upon my hands. I consulted a physician. 'You have auto-intoxication,' he said, and explained that the waste matter was forcing itself into the blood. He handed me a pamphlet advertising Fleischmann's Yeast. I began taking yeast that day. I took it for four months. I have never had another sty since I ate the first cake; and I am freed of constipation."

Mrs. Anna Lenert, San Antonio, Texas

BELOW

"I am the owner of a grocery store and recommend Fleischmann's Yeast especially to my customers who mention having indigestion or nervous trouble. Because it was when I had those troubles myself that I started using Fleischmann's Yeast. I had only a half-hearted hope that it might help me. But in two months I was eating and sleeping normally. Today I have better health than I ever had before. In fact, I believe I am in perfect physical condition, and that Fleischmann's Yeast has been a great factor in helping me gain that ideal condition."

Mrs. Robert Carr, Toronto, Ont.

"Before I began taking Fleischmann's Yeast my face and chest were in a terrible condition with pimples. Finally one day a young woman asked me if I had ever tried Fleischmann's Yeast. After all my failures I thought I might just as well experiment some more . . . After taking Fleischmann's Yeast for three or four months my skin began to be softer and better to look at. Soon my friends began remarking about the change. Now I am in a perfectly healthy condition."

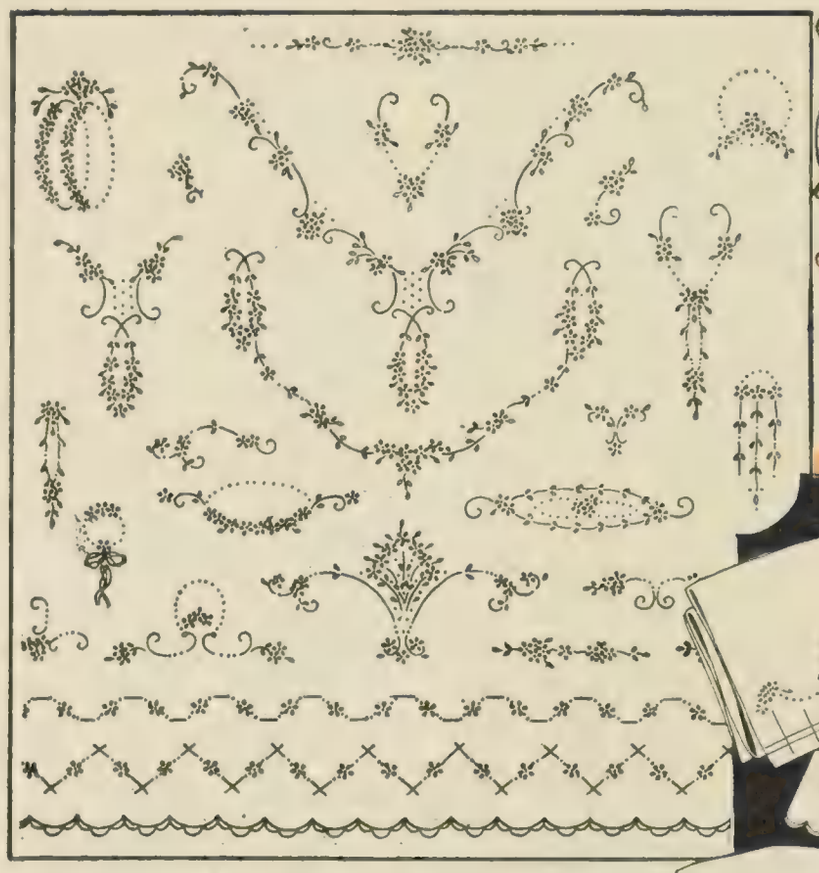
Beatrice Cohen, Toronto, Ont.

BELOW

"Having married somewhat late in life, I soon found myself doing daily the thousands of physical tasks it is necessary for a mother of four children to perform, at an age when most women are able to conserve their strength. I looked and felt at least ten years older than other women my age. I did not want to take medicine. To make a long story short, I began to take Fleischmann's Yeast. And when we found that it was toning up my system and re-building what I had unwittingly torn down, the cake of Yeast acted as leaven to the whole lump of happiness at our house."

Mrs. George N. Davis, Macon, Mo.

"Constipation was my deadliest foe. I always had the tired, sluggish feeling characteristic of this ailment. Impaired appetite, a sallow complexion and a pimply skin also contributed to my misery. My mother was employed by a prominent Boston physician who recommended Fleischmann's Yeast. I finally condescended to give it a trial. I continued for two months, when I noticed a slight change. At the end of the fifth month I had regained my lost vigor and my appetite had improved wonderfully. All signs of ache had vanished and the tired feeling was gone—thanks to Fleischmann's Yeast."



Lawrence A. Perry, Medford, Mass.

This famous food tones up the entire system—banishes constipation, skin troubles, stomach disorders. Start eating it today!

IN this portrait of Mrs. Longworth, recently painted in the library of her home in Washington by the distinguished American artist, Wayman Adams, N.A., her vital beauty and the charm of her magnetic personality are strikingly revealed.

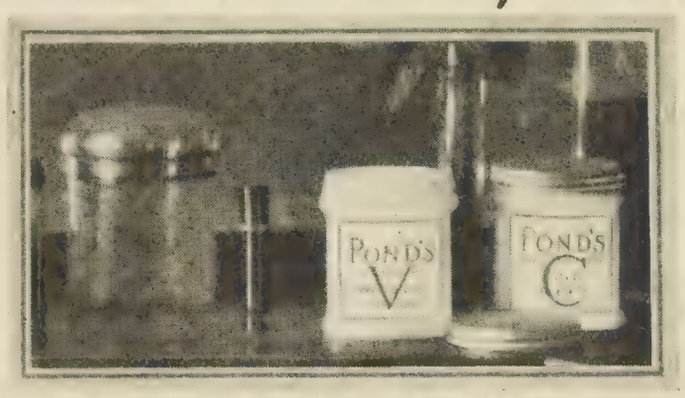
MRS. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH
on keeping one's appearance up to the mark

ALICE ROOSEVELT LONGWORTH, daughter of the late Theodore Roosevelt, and wife of the Speaker-elect of the United States House of Representatives, is her illustrious father's own child.

Vitality and magnetism, trenchant wit, infectious laughter—these she has straight from him. A gay unconscious toss of her head every now and then recalls that "Princess Alice" who, as the daughter of the President, captured the imagination of America. Brilliance of intellect and a keen grasp of public affairs have drawn about her the most personable of Washington's inner circle. No woman has the same influence in the shaping of political events.

But Mrs. Longworth has a personal, a womanly side. She revels in her baby daughter. Her clothes have individuality, a touch of herself. And she believes in guarding her beauty—a whimsical beauty—because the dignity of her life demands that she keep her appearance up to the mark.



KNOWING the true foundation of attractiveness to be a clear, healthy skin she is interested in effective ways of caring for her own. And like other beautiful women of distinguished position she believes in the cleansing and protection which Pond's Two Creams afford:—

Every day, before retiring and always after exposure to the weather, cleanse your face and neck with Pond's Cold Cream, patting it lavishly over your skin. Let it stay on long enough for its pure oils to seep down into the pores. It will float to the surface the accumulations of dust and powder which have clogged them. Wipe off all the cream and dirt. Repeat the process and finish with a dash of cold water. If your skin is dry leave the cream on all night.

OVER your well-cleansed skin, before you go out and before you powder, with delicate finger tips, brush just a touch of Pond's Vanishing Cream. It gives your skin a velvety surface over which your powder adheres smoothly and long. And it protects your skin against chapping cold, drying winds and hurtful dust and soot. Try both these Creams! They will give you that clear, healthy skin Mrs. Longworth believes every woman may possess.

"IT'S important for the woman who is active in the many-sided life of today to keep her personal appearance up to the mark. Brains, ability and social gifts are none the worse for being supplemented by charm and loveliness. The foundation of both is a clear, healthy skin which any woman may possess. She need only give it the proper care by the daily use of Pond's Two Creams."

THIS month brings us our most characteristic holiday. It is recorded that on that wonderful first Thanksgiving Day the feast was held out-of-doors, for there was no community house to accommodate the gathering.

"And now," said the governor, gazing abroad on the piled-up store
Of the sheaves that dotted the clearings and covered the meadows o'er.
"'Tis meet that we render praises because of this yield of grain
'Tis meet that the Lord of the harvest be thanked for His sun and rain."

And so to-day it is "meet" that we pause and consider the origin of this day, lest we forget the purpose and make of it merely a feast day and nothing more.

That first Thanksgiving Day meant existence and continuation of the colony. Gradually the States observed an annual day of Thanksgiving until by presidential proclamation it was made a national holiday.

It is also "meet" this month, not only that we give thanks for the earth's bounty of fruits and vegetables, but that we begin to use them, in their canned and preserved forms, whenever we can crowd them into the menu, though too much repetition should be avoided.

A CHALLENGE

We'll make a little wager with you that if you will try one tube of Listerine Tooth Paste, you'll come back for more.

Large Tube—25 cents

This young fellow—doesn't know sore throat

A PERFECT report card on attendance—never any off-days on account of sore throat.

That's because his mother taught him a little secret—gargling with Listerine, the safe antiseptic, the moment he feels that first dry hitch on swallowing.

Sore throat is a nuisance, anyhow. It interferes with work and fun—and so often leads to more serious troubles that come from throat infections.

Listerine puts you on the safe side. Make it a daily habit during sore throat days.

And Listerine has many other uses that are described in the blue circular wrapped around each bottle. Take a moment to read it.—Lambert Pharmacal Company, Saint Louis, U. S. A.

LISTERINE—never on speaking terms with sore throat

Here's all you have to do:

Use your bottle of Premier

THAT'S all there is to this contest. This is perhaps the easiest money you ever made. Use your bottle of Premier Salad Dressing and experiment with it.

Just tell us the different and practical food uses you have found in one bottle of Premier. The more ways you have found to use it, the better chance you have to win.

$10 to $250 for a letter from you

Here are different practical ways in which one woman told us she used one bottle of Premier in one week:

Sunday night for supper she made egg and olive sandwich filling mixed with Premier.

For lunch on Monday she made a delicious cherry salad, using Premier for the dressing.

On Tuesday she put Premier in a Waldorf salad and seasoned finely chopped cabbage with salt, pepper and Premier Salad Dressing.

Wednesday she made jellied tomato salad, serving it with Premier.

Thursday she served broiled ham with cream sauce made of Premier.

and write us a simple letter...

Friday she used Premier on scalloped fish and on servings of plain lettuce salad.

Saturday she served four guests at bridge with date and nut sandwiches, the filling of which had been well moistened with Premier.

To make it easy for competent judges who will read all letters, number each separate use (namely, 1, 2, 3, etc.), for the number of different practical uses is the deciding factor.

147 prizes—$2,500 in gold

We are awarding $2,500 in 147 different prizes, from $250 to $10 each, to those who send in lists of the greatest number of practical food uses from one bottle of Premier.

Any woman may send in as many lists as she chooses but only one of her lists can win a prize. This contest is open to those who have used Premier. In case of ties, each tying contestant will be awarded the full amount of each prize tied for. Contest closes December 1, 1925.

HOW CAN I MAKE MY CHILD LIKE VEGETABLES?

By Mary F. Henry

Edited and approved by the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University—Martha Van Rensselaer

Acknowledged leaders in vegetable circles are spinach and string-beans, carrots and peas. They are of first importance in the child's vegetable diet

STRING-BEANS FOR BABY?

Of course—and spinach and carrots and peas. Our leaflet, "Vegetable Water for Babies," tells you how to cook vegetable waters for the very tiny baby, how to prepare vegetable purées and pulps as he grows older, all about his vegetable diet for the first two years.

If your baby acquires a taste for vegetables in the first year, it will be an easy matter to keep on feeding him this healthful food.

Your letter to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., with a two-cent stamp for postage, is all you need send for the leaflet.

THERE are always two aspects of the vegetables-for-children problem, one that has to do with the choice of the vegetables themselves, and the other with getting the child to eat what has been selected and prepared. Many a mother reports her Waterloo to have been met at the dinner-table over the plate of vegetables. Indeed, many mothers believe that the problem must always be settled on a battle-field, so difficult does it seem. They almost believe there is an instinct against eating vegetables, and the habit has to be forced in the face of this instinct. This is not true, of course. But what we need to remember is that neither is there an innate liking for them. This means that the problem is one not of forcing but of teaching a habit.

The laws of habit formation are simple: first, the earlier a habit is started the more easily it is established; second, it should be repeated very frequently; and third, the carrying out of the act should give pleasure or satisfaction to the one who is forming the habit. Applying these rules then: start early to teach children to eat vegetables. This is in keeping with the nutrition experts' advice, for they would start the baby on vegetable juice at four to six months; be sure the child has some vegetable each day, mild vegetables at first, in small amounts, with only a small variety until the child is thoroughly accustomed to them. Never accept a complete refusal, unless there is a real reason for refusing, such as sickness or badly cooked vegetables that could easily establish a permanent dislike. Do not force too large amounts, though the child should eat at least some of the vegetable so that he will not get the idea that refusal is an easy thing. And last, and very important, be sure the child somehow gets satisfaction from the eating. This means that the vegetable must be palatable. Vegetables are traditionally badly cooked, which in the main means they are cooked too long. The milder vegetables lose their original attractive flavor through long cooking, and the strong-juiced vegetables develop stronger and less pleasant flavors by overcooking. The shortest time possible to cook them so as to remove their hardness but to leave a little of their crispness not letting them become limp, and to retain their original color, is the problem in vegetable cookery.

In addition all vegetables need attention in regard to flavor and seasoning. The strong vegetables need cooking in a good deal of water, to rid them of their strong flavor. This is always true in cooking strong-flavored vegetables, but it is especially true in preparing them for children, for children do not enjoy very strong flavors. On the other hand, some vegetables are very bland and tasteless and need decidedly to be doctored to make them acceptable. They lack, for example, the acid flavor of fruit, or the very pleasant flavor that makes flesh meat so very popular.

Hence, a mild vegetable seasoned with a little meat-juice or broth or additional butter and salt, and perhaps with a bit of lemon-juice or grating from the lemon-rind, may become so glorified that it is taken without a murmur and more is called for. Ingenious, wholesome methods of making vegetables good are all legitimate, for child as well as for grown-up.

Or again, it may be texture and not flavor that is the difficulty. For instance, a dislike for spinach could easily be acquired from the rather slippery, stringy texture of canned spinach. Canned spinach needs to be finely cut up. Any texture known to be unpleasant to a child should not be forced.

ASSUMING that we have revolutionized the situation and that our children are crying for their vegetables, we must know how best to select them. Vegetables are of especial value for the iron they provide, with its insurance of plenty of material for red blood corpuscles. They are high in roughage or cellulose that prevents constipation, and they are particularly valuable for those powerful little substances that are so closely connected with growth and appetite and vitality in general—the vitamins. Not all vegetables are of equal value, as a glance at the chart below will show. It becomes clear why spinach, peas, string-beans and carrots are the first ones to be given to children. The chart shows that cabbage, onions and celery and others are very valuable, and that some of the root vegetables and the last group are not nearly so valuable as the first groups, although they may be used for variety.

Long cooking may destroy a large part of the antiscorbutic vitamin—an important point. You must remember that you are losing a large part of the iron and vitamins from the food if the water in which they are now fully realized in this artistic Hoosier suite of two-tone grey

Beauty—the new motif in kitchen furnishing!

There's no doubt about it—we work more happily and therefore more efficiently in surroundings that are cheerful, neat, attractive.

So why not beauty in the room that needs it most—in the kitchen as well as in the living room? Why not lighten the burden of work with beautiful surroundings?

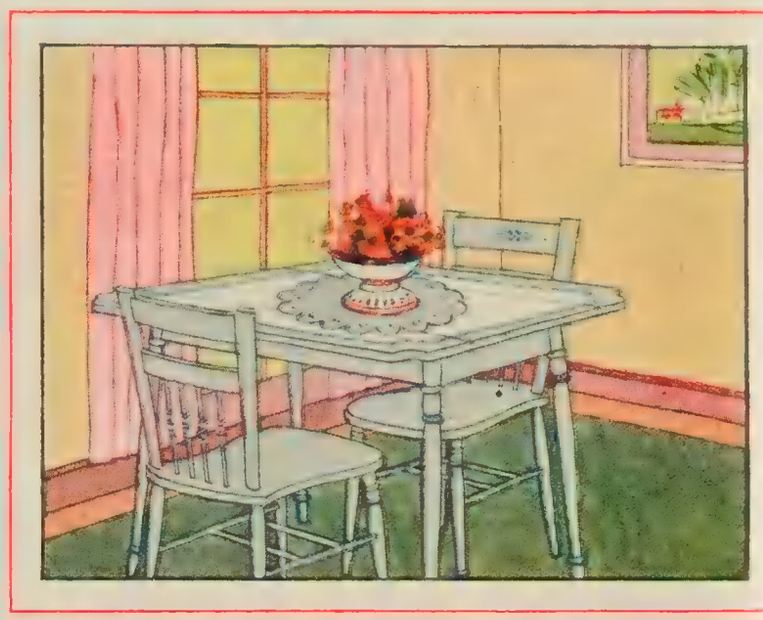
It is for this that Hoosier Kitchen Furniture has been designed with a new motif of beauty. To give the woman in the kitchen a new sense of the dignity of her job and a new enjoyment of it.

You have never seen anything like this new Hoosier suite. So dainty, so artistic! It gives to the kitchen an inviting charm this old workroom has never had before!

The new color scheme of two-tone grey is absolutely original. The body color is soft, rich Hoosier grey. By way of contrast there are panels finished in a satiny Dove grey of lighter tone. A decorative touch is given in an outline band and conventional flowers of a bright, rich blue.

Beautiful, restful it is, and more. It is also very practical. For grey does not show the dirt; it is so easy to keep clean and spotless.

Of course you can get Hoosier Kitchen Furniture in both white enamel and golden oak—finishes always popular and suitable for many kitchens.



Hoosier Furniture is the last word in scientific design, you know. Every piece is the result of years of painstaking experiment in planning and construction. The Hoosier suite consists of the following:

Hoosier Highboy Cabinet. Domestic Science authorities endorse the Hoosier as an ideal working center. It contributes constructive aid in its arrangement of working and storage space, accessories and fittings.

Hoosier Shelf Unit. Here you can store your dishes, utensils and supplies and have them ready at hand right when you want to use them—instead of in a distant pantry.

Hoosier Broom Closet. At last, a place to keep the brooms, mops, vac, etc. Here these necessities are accessible yet out of sight.

Hoosier Breakfast Set. A daintier, more charmingly designed set for breakfast nook or rest corner you've never seen! The table is drop leaf; the chairs are sturdy yet graceful of line.

There's nothing quite so cozy as a breakfast nook and you can make it a real beauty spot with this charming new Hoosier breakfast set Habits are easily formed during the first year. Baby at four or six months is not too young for vegetable soup cooked is not used. This is especially true, of course, if the vegetable is cut in small pieces. Peeling also permits losses into the water. In the case of cabbage or onion water, since it is less delicate in flavor, the loss may be justified, but as far as we can we should use the vegetable water—in soups, or boiled down and served with the vegetable. The more tender and mild vegetables, like carrots and spinach, may be cooked in such a small amount of water that it can easily be used in serving the vegetable. If white sauce is made, vegetable water may be used as part of the liquid.

HOW CAN I MAKE MY CHILD LIKE VEGETABLES?

At four months the baby specialists advocate "vegetable soup," by which they mean strained vegetable water in which have been cooked two or more finely cut-up vegetables, such as celery, carrots and spinach. Any of the other mild vegetables which happen to be in the family meals may be used. This is made fresh each day and is combined with the milk, and so provides a little additional iron and vitamins in the baby's diet. At nine months a very little of the vegetable pulp is pushed through the strainer with the water. When the baby is a year old, a little more vegetable pulp is given him without the water; when he is between two and three years old, sifted pulp is given in increasing amounts; at three years the vegetable is unstrained but still mashed or cut up, especially the tougher vegetables, such as cabbage or string-beans. From then on, vegetables are used in increasing variety and appear constantly in the diet.

As soon as the child is old enough to chew his food thoroughly, raw vegetables, such as lettuce, celery and a little finely-chopped cabbage, may be given. They are very valuable for their higher vitamin content.

And now the nutrition experts' rule may be used: "Two vegetables a day other than potatoes." This rule, followed through one's life, insures vitamins and iron and roughage that will go far toward solving the problem of eating for health.

SPILLED MILK

Little diners do upset their milk or broth once in a while. But they won't ruin your luncheon-set if it is waterproof. You can make a cloth and doilies that are delightfully practical and washable—and yet colorful enough to grace your table even when you entertain. We can tell you how and will send you directions for making other attractive articles of the same fabric.

For yourself or for Christmas gifts for your friends you can find nothing easier to make or more novel and practical. Ask for our leaflet "New Uses for a Practical Fabric." It tells you how to make bright kitchen curtains, chair and table covers, an apron, some unique cushions and several other articles.

All that is needful is to drop a line (with your stamp covering return postage) to Mrs. Sanders, in the House Decoration Department, The Delineator, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and the leaflet will go to you at once.

If you could buy health for Baby

—all the money you now have—all the riches you ever dreamed of getting—would be spent freely and gladly.

Doctors say that to keep Baby in glowing health—from the tips of his pink toes to the top of his curly little head—clean, sweet clothes are vitally important.

Millions of mothers find that the splendid soap and dirt-loosening naptha in Fels-Naptha give them just the extra washing help needed for keeping Baby's things sweet and safely clean.

Also for doing—more easily and more quickly—the whole family wash, and the general cleaning mothers find necessary every day.

Isn't this extra help—for Baby's sake and for your own—worth the penny more a week you pay for Fels-Naptha? It's cheaper in the end, too—any way you figure it.

87% of these New York State Club Women say—

"I prefer Cream of Tartar Baking Powder"

WHEN you want an opinion from a group of forward-looking housewives whose homes represent America's best standards and traditions, where better can you go than to the women's clubs?

It is significant that in a recent survey in New York State when club members were asked "What kind of baking powder do you prefer?" 87% of those replying said "Cream of Tartar."

And they told why—"Always uniform results"—"Most healthful"—"Always comes out best"—"More wholesome. Have never used any other since 1889"—"I use Royal Baking Powder in preference to any other; no cake failures when using it."

FOR more than fifty years the Cream of Tartar for Royal Baking Powder has been imported without interruption from the famous vineyard countries of Southern Europe.

No other principal ingredient of baking powder receives the hearty unanimous endorsement which experts give to Cream of Tartar. That is why Royal,

This thermostat control automatically keeps the temperature of your oven at any desired heat

YOUR OVEN AND ITS CONTROLS

By Ruth Kellogg

Edited and approved by the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University—Martha Van Rensselaer

WHAT'S BURNING?

"Thank goodness, I don't have to say that any more," says Mrs. Often-Forgot. With her efficient controls she never has her oven too hot or too slow now. Her cakes are not soggy one day and too crisp on another. She always gets uniform results.

For only a two-cent stamp to cover postage we will send you a list of controls for gas-stoves and electric stoves, of oven thermometers and heat-regulators. And we'll add some recipes that will show you how easy it is to cook with these helps.

Your kitchen should not be without our booklet of temperature charts either. Have you a copy? It costs nothing but the two-cent stamp for postage and gives you the degrees and time required to bake, cook, boil, can and fry every imaginable food.

Just send your letter to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, and ask for the leaflets that interest you.

NO LONGER do we ascribe success in baking to luck. We know it depends in part upon the equipment with which we work, in part upon our skill in using it and in part upon following certain definite principles which govern cooking.

Along with our changed attitude toward "luck" in cooking has come the realization that to own good equipment is a great saving of time and labor and a great aid in assuring successful results. New devices for measuring and controlling heat and better-built ovens are all now at the disposal of the modern housekeeper.

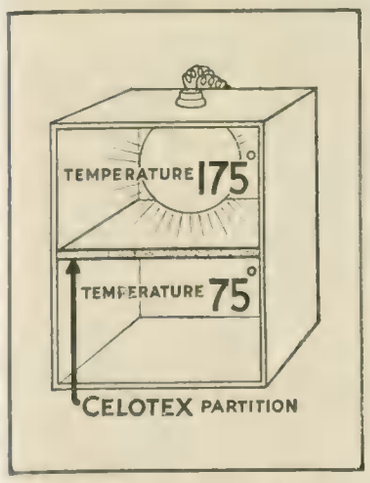
THE OVEN THERMOMETER

WE LEARNED long ago that it pays to measure accurately the ingredients that go into our bread and pies and cakes. Now we are beginning to sense the fact that it pays equally to measure the heat that does the baking. Reliable thermometers are available for any type of oven, and housekeepers are learning to do their baking by temperature instead of by touch—a touch which, by the way, some of us did not possess and seemed unable to acquire.

Considerable confusion seems to exist in distinguishing between thermometers or heat indicators and oven controls. In this connection it must be remembered that an oven thermometer is in itself merely a heat indicator. It tells no more than the actual story of the heat of the oven. It does not and can not do a thing to regulate or control heat. If, therefore, your stove has a thermometer but not a heat-regulator, it is your task to regulate the heat that goes into the oven by checking dampers or opening doors in a coal or wood stove, by lessening the flow of gas or oil or by shutting off the current of electricity in gas, oil and electric stoves respectively.

Some ovens are equipped with thermometers which are built right into the door. These may or may not be entirely accurate as far as exact temperature is concerned, but may still be reliable, for even when an oven thermometer habitually registers from fifteen to twenty degrees more or less than the correct temperature you soon learn its tempo and are able to make your adjustments accordingly. When a stove is purchased which has no oven thermometer, a separate oven thermometer may be bought that is built so that it rests on a small base and may be stood on the rack or floor of the oven. This type of thermometer is gaining wide popularity, because if it is of good grade it is accurate and it may be used in any standard oven regardless of the source of heat.

HEAT-REGULATORS OR CONTROLS



HEAT controls are different from thermometers. To be perfect they should do two things well: First, indicate the temperature of the oven; and, second, control or hold the temperature at the point desired.

One rather inexpensive control sometimes used on gas-stoves does these two things partially but not completely. It works in this way: Suppose the wheel of the indicator is set so that "low heat" is indicated. Through this act the pipe carrying the gas to the oven burner is partly closed so that only a small amount of gas is allowed to enter after the gas-cock has been turned on as far as it will go. This partial closing of the flow of gas remains the same until you readjust the wheel so that some other point such as "high heat" or "medium heat" is indicated. There is nothing automatic about it. If the gas pressure varies, as it often does, the amount of gas coming through will vary, but the control on this type of indicator, not being automatic, can not adjust itself to allow the correct amount of gas to come through to maintain a certain heat. In other words, it has value but also limitations which should be thoroughly understood.

The devices hailed with joy are the automatic thermostat controls that can be used on gas and electric ovens and that meet satisfactorily both requirements mentioned above—namely, indicate temperature and at the same time regulate it. This type of Homes have changed more than people since then

Note this actual test. A Celotex box is divided in half by a layer of Celotex. The upper half is heated by an electric lamp.

The lower half is 100° cooler.

In the roof and walls of a house, Celotex keeps heat in during the winter, out in summer.

A. Clapboards, brick or stucco
B. Celotex Insulating Lumber
C. Studding, or framework
D. Celotex Insulating Lumber
E. Plaster

Cross-section showing application of Celotex Insulating Lumber: (B) in outside walls as sheathing, where it replaces wood lumber and building paper, and (D) on inside walls, where plaster is applied directly to its surface.

LONG before history, a man came out of his cave and built the first rude hut. He was a leader. He used his brain to get a better place to live.

His neighbors watched from their caves, of course. Some of them grunted; and kept on living in caves. But the ones with most sense were quick to build huts for themselves.

In recent years Celotex Insulating Lumber has made it practical to build homes that really keep out heat and cold.

This improvement has been recognized by leading architects and builders as a great step forward in home building. But some will go on building as before.

Homes have changed far more than people since then.

In nearly every community there have been leaders quick to see and make use of this improvement in home comfort.

Two kinds of people
Two kinds of homes

And everywhere a certain class of neighbors have accepted their discovery.

Over 60,000 families now enjoy a degree of living comfort not to be found in ordinary homes.

They are not all wealthy. Anyone who builds can make use of Celotex Insulating Lumber. Because it adds nothing to building cost.

It is not a matter of money. It is simply that some people see and hear and think. Others do not.

Every home tells the story of its owner.

The new standard of living

Your own home, built with Celotex, will give you a wholly new idea of luxurious home comfort. For this Celotex house will keep snug and warm on the bitterest winter days—refreshingly cool through a sweltering summer.

There, your children's health will be guarded from cold-giving draughts and sudden temperature changes.

Always, this Celotex home will be quiet; restful. Disturbing noises will be subdued. It will be a home whose atmosphere of solid comfort will be the envy of all who enter.

Living in this Celotex home, you will have more money to spend on the luxuries you want—for it will cost much less for upkeep than an ordinary home.

You will have a sounder investment: a house that will be stronger, last longer, have a higher resale value.

Get all the facts

These are living improvements so vital that every progressive person will demand the facts before building or buying a home. They make the ordinary house as out-of-date as one without electricity, modern plumbing or a central heating plant.

Ask your architect or contractor or lumber dealer to tell you more about Celotex. All lumber dealers can supply it. Everywhere, leaders in these lines advise its use.

If you are going to buy a home already built, get Celotex construction, if you possibly can.

And by all means send for the Celotex building book. Even if you are not thinking of building soon, you will be interested in this great advance in building history. Just use the coupon below.

Comfort with fuel-saving at no extra building cost

Celotex is Lumber—the only Insulating Lumber.

A home built with it costs no more than an ordinary house; because Celotex replaces five other building materials.

1. It replaces wood lumber as sheathing, giving greater structural strength.

2. Plaster is applied directly to the surface of Celotex, forming a stronger wall than lath and plaster.

3. Celotex replaces building paper, giving better protection against wind and moisture.

4. It replaces deadening felt, giving a restful quiet.

5. Wherever used, Celotex replaces any extra insulation or heat-stopping material.

A smaller, less expensive furnace, fewer radiators, will be required to heat a Celotex house. Year after year, your fuel bills will be cut by one-third.

WE AMERICANS are gaining a new appreciation of the value of health, and a new knowledge of the way toward health.

We are learning the bitter penalties of being "the most nervous nation in the world." We are realizing the foolishness of wasting our energies in a few years of concentrated, feverish effort—followed by longer years spent in self-denial.

We are giving more time to exercise, more thought to the choosing of our food and drink. We know, now, that most of the common ailments originate in "trifling" bad habits—bad habits which have been considered unimportant because they have been so general.

You, too, make this test!

One reliable measure of this new swing toward healthful living is the enormously growing interest in Postum. It is known through their letters that 150,000 people made the thirty-day test described below last year, and many times this number undoubtedly made the test without requesting the week's supply of Postum. The remarkable success of this test in turning an ever-increasing army of men and women from the use of caffein is a good omen for the nation's future health.

In addition to the enthusiasm for Postum prepared in the regular way, there is widespread interest in the new way of preparing Instant Postum with hot milk for children. Thousands of mothers and teachers who have tried it believe that here, at last, is the ideal children's drink.

Just remember this: Caffein has no food value, but is an artificial stimulant which deadens the normal sense of fatigue, and withdraws energy from the body's vital reserve. Postum, on the other hand, contains no trace of any stimulant. It is made of whole wheat and bran, roasted to bring out the full, rich flavor. Compare these two in your own mind first.

Then make the comparison where you can really see results—on your dinner table! Try Postum for thirty days. Learn how delicious it is. Experience for thirty days the relief from drug stimulation. Then judge for yourself!

Carrie Blanchard, famous food demonstrator, makes this offer to you!

Carrie Blanchard's Offer

"I want you to make a thirty-day test of Postum. I will give you, free, one week's supply, and my personal directions for preparing it.

"Or, if you wish to begin the test today, get Postum at your grocer's. You will be glad to know that Postum costs much less—only one-half cent a cup.

"For the one week's free supply, please send me your name and address, and indicate whether you want Instant Postum (prepared instantly in the cup with boiling water or hot milk), or Postum Cereal, the kind you boil."

device may be set for any one of as wide a range of temperatures as is ever necessary for baking purposes, and it automatically keeps the temperature at the point set. Of course it is not endowed with intelligence and will not shut the heat off if the cake begins to burn, but it stops only just short of it. Automatic thermostat controls are made by several different manufacturers and the product made by each manufacturer may be secured on certain stoves. Such a control must be put on the oven at the stove-manufacturing plant. You can not buy your stove, have it set up in your kitchen and then decide later to have this control attached to it.

It works in this way: Suppose a quick or hot oven is desired. You turn the wheel so that the indicator points to 450 degrees Fahrenheit, then light the gas, turning the gas-cock as far as it will go. When the gas has been burning long enough to bring the oven temperature to 450 degrees or almost there—this varies in different makes of controls—the supply of gas reaching the burner is automatically reduced through the action of the expansion of some metal or material at a certain place within the control. This results in holding the temperature at about 450 degrees. If during the baking process the oven door is opened and thus a considerable amount of heat is lost, the thermostat control automatically operates to allow an increased amount of gas to reach the burner in order to bring the temperature again to 450 degrees. In using such a device it is well to remember that at no time is the position of the gas-cock to be changed after the gas has once been lighted. The oven control does that automatically. Suppose, however, you wish to finish your baking at a lower temperature than 450 degrees Fahrenheit—for example, at 350 degrees. Paying no attention to the stop-cock, you reset the control from 450 degrees to 350 degrees and the control regulates the flow of gas automatically. You can tell immediately from the sound that the flame from the oven burner has been greatly reduced. If you look, you may sometimes see that the flame on the burner itself has gone out completely, but the pilot light connected with the control is still burning. As long as the pilot light is going there is no cause whatever for alarm. As soon as the oven temperature has dropped to 350 degrees, or near that point, the gas will automatically again be admitted to the burner, the pilot will light this gas, and the temperature will be maintained at this point. Do you wonder, therefore, that every woman who has ever had the opportunity to work with such automatic thermostatic oven controls becomes an enthusiastic advocate?

An electric oven may be equipped not only with an automatic thermostat control but also with an automatic clock which provides for both starting and shutting off the heat as well as regulating the temperature. This means that you may put food in the oven, set the heat control for a certain temperature, set one device on the clock so that the electric current will come on at a definite hour, and set another device on this same clock so that the current will be cut off at another definite hour and then go about your day's business secure in the knowledge that the cooking will be done in your absence. What more can you ask from oven controls?

Upper: Automatic clock for an electric oven which starts and shuts off heat and regulates temperature. Lower: A thermometer built into the oven door; it indicates temperature but does not regulate it

Corner of Gold Medal Kitchen—where Miss Betty Crocker and her staff Kitchen-test samples from each batch of Gold Medal Flour.

Half your baking success depends upon the way your flour acts!

And that is why we "Kitchen-test" every batch of Gold Medal Flour before it goes to you. To make your baking perfect every time you bake

HERE is something every housewife should know. It may save many bitter moments:

More baking failures are due to the way flour acts in the oven—than to everything else combined.

The quality of a flour may be excellent. It may never vary chemically. And yet it may act differently almost every time you bake. Hence so many baking failures.

There is just one way a miller can make sure his flour will always act the same in all your baking. By baking with it first himself.

We do that with all Gold Medal Flour. We Kitchen-test it! In our own kitchen we bake from samples of every batch. Before any of it is allowed to enter your home.

Here is a flour sure to act the same perfect way every time you bake!

How this test means your success

We have a kitchen just like yours. Each morning we receive samples of each batch of Gold Medal Flour milled the day before. My staff and I bake with them.

If a sample does not bake exactly right—that batch of flour is never allowed to reach you. Each sample must bake in the same perfect way as all the others.

Now you can bake with a light heart. Sure of success! Every sack of this fine flour acts the same perfect way in your oven. And we guarantee it.

Why Not Now?

Our guarantee—make this trial

If at any time Gold Medal Flour does not give you the most uniform good results of any flour you have ever tried—you may return the unused portion of your sack of flour to your grocer. He will pay you back your full purchase price. We will repay him.

Eventually—every woman will use only Kitchen-tested flour. It is the one way you can be sure every sack will always act the same way in your oven. Why not now?

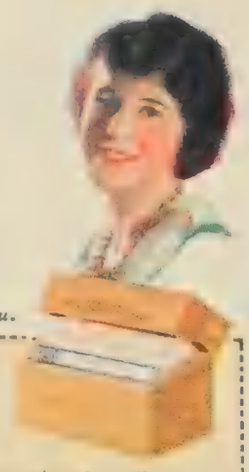
My Special Offer of Kitchen-tested Recipes



AS we test the flour in our kitchen, we are also creating and testing delightful new recipes. We have printed all these Kitchen-tested recipes on cards and filed them in neat wooden boxes. A quick, ready index of recipes and cooking suggestions.

"Service to the Northwest"

The years have not robbed her of her beauty

Hers is the Natural Loveliness that comes from protective care. Millions are retaining the charm of youth in this simple way.

The "middle-aged woman" is fast becoming a relic of other days.

Age no longer is the line of demarcation between days of charm and allure and the tasteless complacency of a chaperon's corner.

Women have learned to stay looking young . . . and "looking" young means being young.

A GIRL yesterday, a woman today . . . then suddenly, "middle-aged."

You want to avoid it. Every woman does. And you can if you wish. Note the scores of women young at 30, charming in the forties that you see everywhere today. That will prove the point to you.

To gain it . . . that priceless gift of youth . . . you must follow natural laws of cleanliness in skin care. Artificial methods have been supplanted in modern beauty culture.

Start with Palmolive, nature's formula to keep that schoolgirl complexion. Don't let it slip away from you. You can't regain youth, but you can keep it.

DO THIS . . . then note the changes in your skin

Wash your face gently with soothing Palmolive. Then massage it softly into the skin. Rinse thoroughly. Then repeat both washing and rinsing. If your skin is inclined to be dry, apply a touch of good cold cream—that is all. Do this regularly, and particularly in the evening. Use powder and rouge if you wish. But never leave them on overnight. They clog the pores, often enlarge them. Blackheads and disfigurements often follow. They must be washed away.

Avoid this mistake

Do not use ordinary soaps in the treatment given above. Do not think any green soap, or represented as of palm and olive oils, is the same as Palmolive.

It costs but 10c the cake!—so little that millions let it do for their bodies what it does for their faces. Obtain a cake today. Then note what an amazing difference one week makes.

REFRESHMENTS FOR THE HALLOWE'EN HOSTESS

By Nellie Ryder Gates

Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University

SPOOKY TREATS

Practical things like appetites appear at even the most ghostly of Hallowe'en parties. Try the exciting eats our Home-Making Department has prepared. We'll send you recipes for Black Cat Raisins, Spook Ice-Cream, Witches' Brew and other fascinating dishes. The address is—Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y. A two-cent stamp, to cover postage, sent to the Party Department will bring you delightful suggestions for "A Money-Raising Hallowe'en Social"—decorations and games that will make your club affair really a "howling success"

Put a little fence of witches round the fruit

Cut sandwiches to look like Jack-'o-lanterns

THERE is no other holiday which gives the hostess such wide opportunities to make her refreshments and decorations unusual and interesting as Hallowe'en.

If you wish a fruit cocktail, what more appropriate than to serve it in a miniature Jack-o'-lantern? To make this, cut off the top of as many oranges as there are guests, remove the pulp, and cut a face on one side. If the features are cut clear through the skin, the holes will have to be plugged to keep the juice from running out, and for this you can use candied cherries, to give the effect of a light within. You could cut down a paper drinking-cup and fit it inside the orange if the contents were very juicy, or you needn't cut the face all the way through. Insert a stem in the lid, a piece of a soda straw, a strip of angelica or a geranium stem. Serve on leaves cut from green crape paper if you can not get the real ones.

Another attractive way to serve fruit is to use canned black and yellow cherries stuffed with nut-meats or bits of candied fruit, and seeded white grapes. Put in mounds on the plates and around each put a little fence made of witches or cats cut from black cardboard in the manner of the old-time strings of paper dolls we used to make in our childhood. Simply fold the paper, cut out one figure, unfold, fasten the ends together, and you will have a circle with which to surround the fruit. This could be used around a salad or a dessert also.

Witch Croquettes could be made pointed and served on a round slice of toasted bread with a band of cress or parsley. For "broomsticks" to serve with them cut carrots into strips and dress with melted butter. Or you might make a large vol-au-vent of sweetbreads or chicken and mushrooms for your main course at dinner, outlining a black cat on top of it with lines or dashes cut from truffles or fresh mushrooms. Serve with little pumpkins made of mashed potatoes, having stems of green pepper.

For a Black-and-White Salad use large prunes. Cook as usual and when cold cut into strips, five or six strips to each prune. Use a slice of canned pineapple for each portion. Put onto a crisp lettuce leaf, make a ball of cream cheese and put into the hole in each slice, and lay the prune strips around the pineapple, radiating from the cheese. Pass mayonnaise with this.

Chestnut Salad. Nuts are particularly appropriate in a Hallowe'en salad. A very unusual salad, and one that once served will prove very popular, calls for chestnuts. Boil, shell and blanch two cups of the large French chestnuts. Chill and cut into small pieces. Add a cup of crisp celery hearts cut into small pieces and two cups of orange cubes. Moisten well with mayonnaise, with whipped cream added to it before using, and serve garnished with bits of candied orange-peel.

For Witches' Bonnets bake a simple chocolate cake in a shallow pan and cut it into circles with a doughnut-cutter. Ice thinly with a dark chocolate icing. You could use "store cookies" if you didn't want to bother with baking. When ready to serve, put a cake on each plate, and in the center put a cone of chocolate ice-cream. For a band use colored candies or salted nuts. This is very good for a children's party as well as for "grown-ups."

A clever sandwich may be made by cutting brown bread in circles and on half the circles cutting out a Jack-o'-lantern face with a sharp knife. Spread the whole halves with a piquant filling, cover with the "faces," and put pieces of pimientoes into the holes.

A lovely effect for a Hallowe'en table and one quite in the spirit of the day may be had by using brown cambric for the tablecloth. For flowers use oak or maple leaves in Autumn colorings and several spikes of the brilliant orange-red poker plant. Tall orange candles should be placed about the center. To give salads, cakes or desserts a Hallowe'en air, cut tiny cats, bats and witches from black paper and paste two of them together with a toothpick between so they can be stuck into the dish.

Banished!

Those "teen age" morning blues!

—with a good hot breakfast to renew the energy supply

Every age has its problems, but any mother will say the most difficult of all is the "teen age." No longer children; not yet grown-up; a "between" stage hard to handle.

The first hour of the day often seems particularly trying. Young bodies are tired out with rapid growing and strenuous study and play.

Yet they must be up and off to school on time. No wonder spirits are at low ebb or tempers at high pitch!

The first need of growing children

Physicians say the first thing children need in the morning is a breakfast of hot, nourishing food; that children of any age should never be allowed to go to school without a proper breakfast.

The main thing breakfast should supply is the one thing high school girls and boys use in greatest amount—energy!

An energy breakfast, delicious enough to tempt capricious appetites, leisurely eaten! Mothers can supply this quickly and easily in one famous food—Cream of Wheat.

Cream of Wheat is a wonderfully rich energy food. Made of the best hard wheat, it is high in carbohydrate content or energy substance.

But it has another advantage equally valuable. It is in a very simple, easily digested form. It asks no extra work of digestion, robbing the energy supply which the body needs so badly.

Rich energy to last the morning through—easily, quickly available for use! This is what a Cream of Wheat breakfast gives to all the family.

Send for free sample box of Cream of Wheat—enough for four generous cereal servings. We will also send our recipe book which gives 50 tempting dishes made with Cream of Wheat. We have an authoritative book on babies' and children's diet, approved by nutrition authorities, which we will send free.

COMFORTS FOR THE INVALID

By Elizabeth Nitchie

Would you like to know a number of ingenious and inexpensive gifts that will interest and amuse an invalid? THE DELINEATOR has a new leaflet just brimming over with helpful suggestions which can be had for the asking. Address Mrs. Charles Bradley Sanders, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., enclosing a two-cent stamp for postage.

IS THERE some one in your home who is recovering from a long and serious illness?

Without doubt you want to surround your invalid with every comfort that money can buy; but, alas, luxuries are costly things and often out of the question when there are doctor's bills to pay. Money does not run in every family, but wits are a good substitute. Love and devotion can find many ways to shorten the weary hours of illness or convalescence.

We have worked out a number of comforts for the convenience and pleasure of the sick person. Let us tell you of a few of them. Your own ingenuity will suggest others fitted to your particular invalid.

First of all you probably find it difficult to prop up your shut-in. Try a pillow filled with excelsior under the feather pillows. It has more stamina and resistance than a feather one, and more resilience than one of straw.

Is your sick-a-bed thin? Then doubtless her (or his) bones seem to stick through the skin and hurt cruelly. Your doctor may have suggested a rubber ring to relieve the pressure on the end of the spine; but rubber is heating and the cushion is apt to become an annoyance. Cover it with eight or ten layers of cheese-cloth, backed by one layer of strong white cloth. The cheese-cloth, being very porous, allows air to circulate between the rubber and the skin and makes the whole thing cooler.

Then invest in as many tiny down pillows as you feel you can afford. They are invaluable. A healthy person does not realize how hard even good, soft feather pillows can become. Put a down pillow under the tired head and one under each elbow to keep them from getting sore. Make the pillows yourself if you want to have especially small ones. When the knees of the sick-a-bed become very tired, a pillow tucked underneath them rests them and allows them to flex a little.

BED-SPRINGS which can be elevated are made, but, of course, they are too expensive for the average pocketbook. A small pillow placed under the mattress protector, where it will not be heating, is an excellent substitute. It can be easily moved and adjusted.

The backs of the heels are two other spots which are apt to become sore. Make two rings of absorbent cotton and cover them with cheese-cloth. The heel fits into the hole of the "doughnut" and is relieved from pressure on the bed.

While we are on the subject of feet, let us tell you of another scheme. The invalid often complains that the bedclothes weigh heavily on the feet. Two pillows tucked in at the foot of the bed at either side lift the covers a little. But as these are apt to be hot and bulky, we have devised something that costs practically nothing and is perfectly satisfactory. Let us see if we can describe it to you.

We took two cheap black metal book-ends and put one at each side of the foot of the bed on the springs, treating the mattress as if it were a row of books. To the top of each one we fastened by means of picture-wire a smooth board long enough to lift the covers well above the feet. This length would vary, of course, with the thickness of the mattress. Be sure to round off the top corners of each board so that there will be nothing to catch the bedclothes. If the wire is covered with tape, this annoyance will be avoided. The board that we used was very thin and light—so light that we could use a penknife to shape it. Near the top of each board we made a hole. Into these holes we put the ends of an extension brass curtain-rod, the smallest size, screwing the tips of the rod outside of the boards. This device holds up the covers very well and costs only about twenty-five cents.

A SMALL bag which can hang on a hook beside the bed is another very useful article. Made of pretty bright silk, just big enough to hold glasses, a handkerchief, a pencil and a little pad, it is a most welcome and handy comfort for the invalid.

Pay a visit to a notion store and purchase a little megaphone and a small mirror. The sick person will not have to strain herself or himself shouting for you if he has the megaphone. Moreover, you can hear distinctly what is desired and will not have to come running from the other end of the house to find out the order. The mirror suspended on the window-frame or wall may be tipped to show the invalid a glimpse of the street and will stimulate his interest in the world out-of-doors.

A slender stick about eighteen inches long—the kind that comes in a pot of tulips—is another simple but valuable contrivance with which the sick-a-bed can reach and hook many things.

Many other small articles which can be purchased for a small sum can be utilized to amuse the invalid.

To Avoid Colds This Winter

Do as your Doctor says–

Keep your body warm. No matter what outer clothing you wear, it is essential that you wear warm, well fitting underwear—underwear that will not only absorb perspiration, but will keep your body from being chilled.

It is no longer necessary to shiver through the long winter months in order to be stylishly dressed.

Styles have changed in underwear as well as in outer wear, and today, underwear is made to conform to the styles of the outer garments.

Forest Mills
UNDERWEAR

FOREST MILLS UNDERWEAR is made to meet every requirement in a wide variety of styles and weights. The popular sleeveless style with the built-up shoulders or the bodice top with the narrow tape shoulders, insures a neat tailored appearance and yet gives warmth and comfort. For those who desire additional warmth there is the long or short sleeves, with the knee or ankle length.

It is beautifully made from the finest of yarns and the greatest care is exercised in every phase of its manufacture.

Every garment fits snugly without a wrinkle, yet is so pliable that it will give readily with every movement of the body.

Every member of the family can keep warm this winter in a comfortable suit of Forest Mills Underwear.

"We were talking about you the other day"

Marge and Jane were chatting over the tea cups.

"Really, I envy you, Marge," Jane said. "We were talking about you the other day. All the girls agree that you are the best housekeeper in our whole crowd."

"Oh! don't be silly, Jane, you know I'm not. The only thing is, I have to do my own housework, so naturally I spend a little more time studying how to get the best results in the shortest time."

"I know, Marge, but all of us have vacuum cleaners and washing machines, and all those labor saving devices just like you do. But somehow, your house always seems so immaculate.

"Take your floors for instance; in our house the floors are one of my greatest problems. There are places that look as if the whole American Army had marched over them with hob-nailed shoes.

"I had poor Bob down on the floor the other evening going over those places around the doorways, but he couldn't make them look much better, poor boy, so we decided all the downstairs rooms would have to be sandpapered and refinished. It's going to cost at least a hundred dollars!

"Now tell me, Marge, how do you avoid such expenses and still keep your floors so clean and new looking—do you and Tom go around in your stocking feet all the time?"

"Jane, you're the funniest person I ever knew—of course not, foolish! We wax our floors."

It is easy to have perfect floors now that you can get Johnson's Liquid Wax. Just apply the liquid lightly with a Lamb's-wool Mop and then go over with a weighted polishing brush. The brush does all the work for you.

A complete outfit consisting of a Lamb's-wool Wax Mop, a weighted polishing brush, a quart of Johnson's Liquid Wax and an instruction book costs but $5.00, and it's so simple.

Any dealer displaying this sign can supply you with this outfit.

A 28-page illustrated booklet, "The Proper Treatment of Floors, Woodwork and Furniture" together with a generous sample of Johnson's Liquid Wax will gladly be sent you free.

FLOWERING BUSHES AND BLOSSOMING TREES

By F. F. Rockwell

What flower-bed has the startling beauty of a blossoming fruit-tree?

LET'S GET DOWN TO EARTH

Whether you want annuals or perennials, shrubs or flowers, you won't have any garden at all unless you consider your soil—now. Is it clayey or too loose? Infected with insects? Does it need fertilizer? What kind? All these questions perplex the home gardener.

We have a leaflet that will answer them for you. Just send a two-cent stamp for postage to the Garden Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, and ask for "Autumn Soil Needs."

Evergreens may be used to make a year-round border for the walk

DO YOU long for a garden or for plants that will make your house feel at home in and yet find yourself unable to devote many hours to the care of it? If so, solve your problem by planting flowering trees, vines and bushes, which give the most in beauty for the least caretaking.

Of the good flowering trees, there is none equal in all-around beauty and usefulness to the dogwood (cornus florida). A cloud of white in the early Spring and a glory of crimson in the Autumn, with a horizontally spreading form that blends in with most other growth in a charming contrast, it is one of the easiest of all trees to grow, and one most universally adapted to soils and climates.

The decorative or "flowering" cherries, apples, crabs, almonds and other "fruit" trees are for the most part hardy and extremely beautiful.

The evergreens have two distinct uses in planting even the very small place. First, a few of the tall-growing varieties of hemlock, spruce, fir or cedar, to be placed at some point or points along the outer boundary, especially north or west of the house; and second, the dwarf-growing varieties along the foundation-line of the house, and grouped on either side of the entrance steps, with here and there a taller one, such as a cedar, at the house corners or between windows. No other single bit of planting can so revolutionize the appearance of a small place as a good foundation planting. It is a mistake, however, and one not uncommonly made, to use only evergreens in the base planting. A much more pleasing effect can be had by using along with the evergreens some of the low-growing flowering shrubs.

The hardier flowering shrubs require less care and attention than any other class of plants which can be counted upon for color the season through. Very little pruning (except to cut out an occasional dead branch) will be needed, and practically no spraying, as few insects or diseases trouble them. To keep them in vigorous growth, the ground should be forked up around them each Spring, and a handful or two of coarse ground bone worked well into the soil.

IN PLANTING shrubs, the first principle is to avoid straight lines. The shrubbery groups, or "border," should be placed at the back, to produce a natural effect such as Nature does along the edge of a field. For this purpose plant the shrubs close together—two to four feet apart for the smaller varieties—three to five for the larger. In order to have some color the season through, at least one or two things should be selected from those blooming each month. Except in the few cases where something is said to the contrary, all of these shrubs are hardy without protection as far north as middle New England and the Great Lakes. The blooming dates given are for the latitude of Philadelphia to New York; farther south they bloom earlier; farther north later.

The earliest-blooming shrubs—late March and April—include several quite tall shrubs or small trees, suitable for individual specimens on the lawn, planting against a wall or evergreens or just outside of the garden hedge. The average height in feet of the following shrubs is indicated by the figures in parenthesis, just after the name. One of the most striking of these is scarlet thorn (crataegus coccenia) (20), which does particularly well in heavy soil. The Judas tree (cercis canadensis) (20) is one of the most effective of all early shrubs. Among the smaller early shrubs are: the Japanese quince (5), Thunberg's spirea (4), several varieties of golden bell (Forsythia) (8), especially the drooping or trailing forms, and the little Daphne (3) with its delicate lilac flowers.

May brings the greatest wealth of flowering shrubs, such as the lilacs (15-20); the bridal wreath (spirea prunifolia) (8), with its gracefully arching branches of small white flowers; and the old-time mock orange (philadelphus coronarius) (10), with its scented white blossoms. The mock orange, by the nourishing as fruit, confection or food

OUR PROGRESSIVE AGE is teaching every woman something about foods. She understands that in eating there must be a touch of science as well as flavor. She wants to set her table according to a standard of nourishment. And in addition to ordering good foods, good to eat and easy to prepare, she asks carefully about food values.

She knows it is important to eat natural foods—the fruit of the soil and of the trees—untouched by the modern refinements that so often rob us of essential nourishment.

Natural foods retain the constructive properties on which our bodies depend. The woman who serves all the fruit and vegetables she can is guarding the health and happiness of her family.

Dates, for instance, are a natural food, with a generous content of mineral salts. Calcium, one of the important minerals, is the essential food for bone and teeth—iron, as you know, is nature's finest tonic. The date contains natural sugar which is immediately absorbed by the body as energy. This digestible date-sugar is developed by the sun. For dates come to you just as they leave the trees—their golden ripeness is imprisoned sunlight.

And with all their nutritive value, dates have a delicate flavor. They are good to eat. And they are a simple cooking ingredient as well as a hearty fruit or tempting between-meal snack. This page will tell you some of the best ways and some of the best times for serving them.

. . . . .

DATES IN MUFFINS OR BREADS

Have you ever tried stirring cut-up dates in your ordinary muffin batter, just before placing in the muffin pans? It makes an entirely new flavor! Average two dates to a muffin. Dates in bran flour are a treat to taste—a health combination hard to surpass!

LET THIS PAGE show you some new ways to fix dates. If you prepare them in this simple way, you will discover a new ingredient for delicious dishes—and for Thanksgiving. As you open a package of golden dates, separate them at once—and save minutes. Take a date between the thumb and forefinger endwise, exactly as the illustration shows. You will need a small, sharp kitchen knife, holding it very near to the end of the blade. Slit the date cleanly from end to end. As you do this, squeeze the ends slightly, and the pit will be free. Then cut the date crosswise (just as you would a lemon) into four or five pieces. Stone and cut enough dates for your recipe—then try them cooked—say in date and cranberry pie.

DROMEDARY DATES

The FRUIT CONFECTION FOOD

For a very tempting date loaf, put the cut-up dates in the dry ingredients of your bread, just before you moisten. One layer of a package of dates is enough for the average loaf.

DATES DELICIOUSLY STUFFED

Thanksgiving suggests these delicacies. Try them on the table then if not before—there is no more tempting sweetmeat, nor one that is so healthful. After the dates are pitted, fill them with a pleasant ingredient like cream cheese, or peanut butter, nuts or fondant. Stuffed dates are good rolled in sugar—or in Dromedary Cocoanut. Try them for tea sometime instead of cake.

A THANKSGIVING PIE!

Blend 1½ tablespoons of flour with two tablespoons of water. Stir this into 3 cups of hot cranberry sauce. Cook for three minutes. Add 1 cup of pitted and sliced dates. After cooling, pour into pie-dish, which has been lined with crust. A lattice top crust is most appropriate for this delicious pie. Bake for 35 minutes, with hot oven for first ten, then gradually reducing temperature. A pie with little crust and cooked fruit is nourishing as well as delicious.

How does she keep her skin flawless—youthfully smooth and clear? Of 250 actresses playing this season in New York, nearly three-fourths use Woodbury's.

180 Leading Actresses of the NEW YORK STAGE declare that this soap is best for their skin

SHE must never grow old.

Starry-eyed, laughing-lipped, with cheeks like a rose—she must create an illusion of never-dying youth and joy for the tired, work-a-day world.

An actress cannot neglect her appearance, even for a single day, any more than an athlete can neglect his training. Her success, not only as a woman, but as an artist, depends on a beautiful physical condition.

How does the successful actress of today take care of her skin? What soap does she use to keep it smooth and fine in spite of harsh make-up?

What they said when interviewed

We asked two hundred and fifty leading actresses of the New York stage, playing in 44 of this season's plays, what soap they used for the care of their skin.

One hundred and eighty—or nearly three-fourths of the entire number—said they were using Woodbury's.

"It is a wonderful soap for the skin"—"It doesn't sting as other soaps do"—"It leaves a nice, smooth finish"—"It closes enlarged pores"—"Oily skin was cured by using it"—"I have a perfect skin. I have used Woodbury's for years."

ARE YOU TROUBLED with blackheads, an oily skin, or any other skin defect? If so, learn how to overcome it from the booklet which is wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap.

These were some of the comments made by the actresses. Every one of the Woodbury users was eager to speak some word of praise for the soothing, non-irritating quality of Woodbury's.

A skin specialist worked out the formula by which Woodbury's is made. This formula not only calls for absolutely pure ingredients. It also demands greater refinement in the manufacturing process than is commercially possible with ordinary toilet soap. In merely handling a cake of Woodbury's one notices this extreme fineness.

Around each cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap is a booklet of special cleansing treatments for overcoming common skin defects. A 25-cent cake of Woodbury's lasts a month or six weeks.

Get a cake of Woodbury's today, and begin tonight the treatment your skin needs.

way, is one of the few shrubs requiring pruning; most of the old wood should be cut back to the ground every third or fourth year.

Among the lower-growing May shrubs are several of the hardy azaleas, the most showy of all small shrubs; the Japanese (mollis) azaleas; azalea nudiflora, our native pinkster, which likes moist locations; and the brilliant-colored flame azalea; these range from three to six feet in height. Then there are the deutzias (6), not quite so hardy as most of the other shrubs mentioned here; Kerria japonica (8), distinct with its long sprays of little golden bells, and blooming for a long time; and Van Houtt's spirea (8).

In June there are several more splendid tall shrubs, including the Japanese lilacs (20-25), and the cockspur thorn (cratægus crus-galli) (25); and a number of lower-growing ones such as the fragrant azalea (azalea arborescens) (4); spirea callosa (4); the later-flowering weigelas and deutzias, which average some six feet in height; and hydrangea arborescens (8), incidentally one of the best for seaside planting, as it thrives in light, sandy soil and salt air.

Fewer shrubs flower in July and August, but we have the rose of Sharon (12-15), and then there is hydrangea P. G. (paniculata grandiflora) (10), with its enormous trusses which remain into the Winter. As July and August are seashore months it is interesting to know that the French tamarix (tamarix gallica) (15) with its beautiful feathery foliage and pink flowers, and the groundsell tree (10) both thrive in dry, sandy soil. So also do tamarix odessana (6) and the oak-leaved hydrangea (6); the sweet-pepper bush (clethra alnifolia) (8-10), a very fragrant native shrub, and the bush arbutus (abelia grandiflora) (5), also very fragrant, bloom throughout late Summer. The latter thrives particularly well at the seashore, but is not hardy much farther north than Philadelphia. The crimson spirea, Anthony Waterer (6), and Billord's spirea (8), pink, flower late in the season.

For a formal front hedge which can be kept clipped or trimmed to a smooth even surface, nothing is better than the California privet. This is not wholly hardy in the northern states, where one of the more hardy forms, such as Amur River North or ibota should be used. For a low, informal hedge, Japanese barberry (three to four feet), which flowers prettily in the Spring and carries its red berries through the Winter, is unsurpassed. In the extreme north and northwest, the low-growing cotoneasters are much used. Where a taller hedge, a really dense screen, is wanted, one of the evergreens, such as hemlock or white pine, both of which grow rapidly, may be used. The shrubs and deciduous trees may be set out in the Autumn September — and October. Shrubs or trees set out in the Autumn should be thoroughly mulched with six inches or so of marsh hay, straw or leaves, during the first Winter. In planting, dig the holes sufficiently large to take the ball of roots and soil without any crowding, and deep enough so that rotted manure and bonemeal can be dug into six inches or so of soil in the bottom of the hole, upon which the roots will rest. Tamp the soil in firmly about the roots with a rounded stick, and when the hole is half-full, pour in water and let it settle slowly. Then fill the balance of the hole with fine, rich soil. If further watering is necessary, make holes down to the roots with a pointed stick, and pour the water into these.

How the Society Woman, the Debutante, Meets the Demands of Daily Modern Life

This new way in solving woman's oldest hygienic problem enables one to live each day as it comes—exquisite, immaculate, confident, even under the most trying of conditions.

By ELLEN J. BUCKLAND, Graduate Nurse

FROM morning until midnight! A luncheon, a lecture, a dinner, the opera . . . a hygienic handicap that is real . . . yet never the precious charm of a moment lost!

Thousands of women, whose lives direct the social calendar, employ this new way which so exquisitely supplants the uncertainty of the old-time "sanitary pad" with a calm assurance of utter immaculacy.

Your daintiest frocks, your filmiest of gowns . . . wear them now in security. The modern woman lives every moment, of every day, unhandicapped.

New Advantages You'll Appreciate

This new way embodies three factors of importance . . . plus many others.

It is different in material from any other product obtainable for this purpose.

It absorbs 16 times its own weight in moisture! It is 5 times as absorbent as the ordinary cotton pad. And thus assures a true protection.

It is as easily disposed of as a piece of tissue . . . and thus banishes the embarrassing difficulty of disposal . . . and laundry.

It deodorizes . . . and thus supplies a feeling of security that old ways denied.

AND . . . it is obtainable everywhere, at every drug store, every department store—virtually at every corner—to meet emergencies.

You ask for them by name, and without hesitancy, simply by saying—Kotex.

If you have not tried Kotex, please do. It will make a great difference in your life, in your viewpoint, in your peace of mind and health.

60% of many ills, common to women, according to many leading medical authorities, are traced to the use of unsafe and unsanitary makeshift methods.

Hygienic authorities charge almost 80% of the lack of charm, poise and immaculacy, expected of women in this modern day, to the same mistake in hygiene.

Thus, on every count, millions are turning to this new way.

Test Kotex, Please

A fair test will prove its advantages beyond all question. No other method will ever satisfy.

Obtain Kotex today at any department or drug store.* In many, you'll find them already wrapped on a display table, and ready to take out without even having to ask.

You'll appreciate these 3 factors

(1) Utter protection—Kotex absorbs 16 times its own weight in moisture: 5 times that of the ordinary cotton pad, and it deodorizes, thus assuring double protection.

(2) No laundry. As easy to dispose of as a piece of tissue—thus ending the trying problem of disposal.

(3) Easy to buy anywhere.* Many stores keep them ready-wrapped in plain paper—simply help yourself, pay the clerk, that is all.

Spiced cranberries are one of the most easily prepared of relishes—and one of the most delicious

CRANBERRIES ALL THE YEAR 'ROUND

By Lucile Brewer

Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Director of the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University

SATISFYING OR A TEASER?

You can make cranberries either way. Piquant and appetite-teasing in a Cape Cod Cocktail or altogether satisfying in a Veal Drumstick Stuffing. Try your hand with the pungent red berry, and if you want more variations we have them. Just a two-cent stamp to cover postage will bring you a delectable group. Send your letter to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

ALTHOUGH the cranberry is traditionally associated with Thanksgiving and Christmas as an indispensable accessory of the dinner, it is equally delectable and palatable through the entire year. No longer are cranberry sauce and cranberry pie the only staple dishes prepared from this gay red berry. It may hold a more important place in every part of the menu. The juice and flavor may add zest and color to the fruit cocktail. For variety instead of the usual cranberry sauce it may be served with the main course as a frozen punch or an equally delicious frappé. It may also form the most attractive part of the salad, either as the base or as a part of the dressing, or both. Its possibilities in puddings and pies, used alone or combined with other fruits, are unlimited. As a confection in creamy wafers, bonbons or divinity it adds the finishing touch to the most popular dinners of the year.

The use of a small amount of cranberry jelly in brown gravies gives an excellent flavor.

During the season when cranberries are plentiful the sauce may be prepared as usual and sealed in clean, hot jars for later use. The strained cranberry-juice may be canned and used to make a most delicious cold drink. Cranberries combined with apples, pineapples, oranges, lemons and nuts in conserves, jams and marmalade make a colorful contribution to the Winter table. Cranberry-juice and apple-juice make a jelly perfect in color, flavor and texture. Since red and green form an important part of the color of the holiday season, cranberry and apple jelly may be molded in alternate layers with the apple jelly flavored with mint and tinted green. Not only does this add a decorative touch but it is a delicious accompaniment to practically all meats.

Cranberry sauce is usually prepared in two ways: First, the cranberries are carefully picked over, mashed and cooked in about one-half their measure of water. When the skins are tender, the same amount of sugar as of water is added and the cooking continued until the mixture is clear. This sauce will not jelly. Second, the first part of the above procedure is followed and when the berries are tender they are forced through a fine wire sieve to remove the skins. Sugar is added in the proportion of one cup of sugar to one cup of pulp, and this mixture is cooked until it sheets from the spoon. It is then turned into glasses or molds to cool.

Whether the berries are to be strained or not, they should be cooked as rapidly as possible until they are tender, since quick cooking preserves their bright color and flavor. Long, slow cooking tends to detract from both color and flavor.

THE following recipes suggest different ways of using cranberries and also ways of utilizing small quantities of left-over cranberry jelly or sauce.

VEAL DRUMSTICK WITH CRANBERRY STUFFING

1½ pounds veal cutlet
2 cups soft bread-crums
3 tablespoons melted butter
1 beaten egg
1 teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon poultry seasoning
⅔ cup cranberry sauce

Mix thoroughly. Wrap a piece of the cutlet around a ball of the stuffing and press into the shape of a drumstick; fasten with toothpicks or small steel skewers. Into the small end insert a piece of uncooked macaroni to represent the bone, brush with melted butter and place the drumsticks in a baking-dish; add boiling water to cover the bottom of the dish. Cover closely and bake one hour in a moderate oven (350 degrees Fahrenheit). Serve with brown gravy. To vary the stuffing add raisins or one tart apple chopped to the cranberry sauce.

HOT TOASTED CRANBERRY SANDWICH

In a small amount of fat, brown medium-thick slices of cold boiled ham. Lay each piece on a slice of hot buttered toast. Add hot cranberry sauce and sprinkle with grated Parmesan cheese. Garnish with parsley and serve at once.

CRANBERRY RABBIT

½ cup milk
1 egg
½ cup grated cheese
2 tablespoons butter
½ teaspoon mustard
½ teaspoon salt
½ cup cranberry-pulp

Heat the milk, add the cheese and butter. Beat the egg, add to it the salt and mustard. When the cheese has melted, add the egg mixture and cook until smooth and thick. Add

Cashmere Bouquet Soap

As far back as the beginning of history, perfume has always been associated with articles of the toilet. Lacking soap, these people of an earlier civilization used fragrant oils for cleansing the skin.

Today these soothing, cleansing oils and a matchless perfume are combined in each firm white cake of Cashmere Bouquet Soap. To those who find joy and satisfaction in perfume, there is no more reason for using an unperfumed soap than for dispensing with perfume in any other toilet article.

THE blue eyes, the smile and the sunny hair belong to Kirkham Cornwell, son of Dean Cornwell, dean of American illustrators and artists of note. This portrait, painted by Cornwell pere was hung "On the Line" at the last exhibition of the National Academy. . . . We have it direct from headquarters that Kirkham eats Post's Bran Flakes regularly because he likes them and because his mother believes in rosy cheek insurance.

For Rosy Cheek Insurance

Every mother wants to keep her children well and happy. And she knows from experience she must always be on guard against the dangers of faulty elimination.

Unless digestive waste is carried off at regular intervals poisons are generated in the intestine and the growing body falls easy prey to the many ills of childhood.

Drug laxatives should rarely be administered to children except at doctor's orders.

Elimination can best be regulated by the proper diet, and in thousands of American homes, intelligent mothers give their little folks Post's Bran Flakes every day as an "Ounce of Prevention."

These delicious flakes of bran provide the right amount of bulk for the intestine and at the same time yield such vital food essentials as phosphorus, iron, carbohydrates, proteins and the important Vitamin B.

Adults, as well as children, can eat Post's Bran Flakes with benefit every day and without tiring the palate.

Serve this delicious bran food frequently with milk or cream just as it comes from the package, like Post Toasties or Grape-Nuts. Add it to cooked cereals of all kinds. Bake it into bread and muffins.

Make up your mind now to avoid the dangers of faulty elimination at your house. Keep the family eating Post's Bran Flakes every day as "An Ounce of Prevention."

the cranberry-pulp, and serve on slices of hot toast with crisp bacon curls. The rabbit should be cooked in a double boiler and served at once, as the color changes if it is allowed to stand.

CRANBERRY-COFFEE TART

Any good roll dough mixture may be used for the tarts. After the dough has risen once, roll it about one-fourth of an inch thick. Brush it with melted butter and cut it in medium-sized circles. With a small cutter remove the center of one-half the circles. On each of the uncut circles put one tablespoon cranberry sauce. Cover with the open-center circles, press the outside edges together and put them on a baking-sheet about two inches apart. Let rise and when they are light bake in a hot oven (400 degrees Fahrenheit) for twenty minutes. These tarts should be served hot, but are very good cold, or they may be reheated.

CRANBERRY BREAKFAST BREAD

Use the same kind of dough as in the above recipe. Roll the dough in a rectangular sheet about one-third of an inch thick, brush with melted butter and spread evenly with thick cranberry sauce, leaving an uncovered space at the edges of the dough. Beginning at the side, roll the dough as for cinnamon rolls or jelly rolls. Press edges together. Lift the roll onto a baking-sheet, brush with melted butter, let rise and when it is light bake in a moderately hot oven (350 degrees Fahrenheit) for thirty minutes. When cold, cut in thin slices.

CRANBERRY SHERBET

1 quart water
2 cups sugar
1 tablespoon gelatin
2 lemons
1 pint cranberry-juice

Boil the water and sugar together for five minutes. Add the gelatin, which, if non-hydrated, has been softened in half a cup of cold water and dissolved over heat, or, if hydrated, has simply been melted in half a cup of hot water. Then add the lemon-juice and cranberry-juice. Strain, cool and freeze.

CRANBERRY JELLY

4 cups cranberries
2 cups sugar
1 cup boiling water

Pick over and wash the cranberries. Place them in a saucepan, pour the boiling water over them and boil for twenty minutes. Press through a sieve, stir in the sugar, return to the fire, and cook for five minutes longer, or until it sheets from the spoon. Turn into fancy molds or individual cups. When cold, unmold and serve. The jelly may be placed in clean, hot jars and sealed for future use.

CRANBERRY BREAD PUDDING

2 cups stale bread-crums
1 quart scalded milk
⅓ cup sugar
2 tablespoons melted butter
4 eggs
½ teaspoon vanilla

Add the butter, sugar and salt to the milk. Add the crums and allow the mixture to stand until the bread has soaked up the milk. Add the slightly beaten eggs, and the salt and vanilla. Pour the mixture into a buttered baking-dish, and bake it from forty-five minutes to one hour at 300 degrees Fahrenheit. While the pudding is still warm, cover with a generous layer of thick cranberry sauce and serve it with whipped cream.

COMBINATION SALAD

1 pint thinly sliced cabbage
¾ cup diced pineapple
Salt
⅓ cup chopped English walnuts or almonds
½ cup cranberry sauce

Mix cabbage, pineapple and cranberry sauce with cranberry mayonnaise. Serve the salad in lettuce cups and sprinkle with the chopped nuts.

FROZEN CRANBERRY CREAM

2 cups sugar
1 cup water
2 egg-yolks
¼ cup lemon-juice
1 cup heavy sour cream
2 cups cranberry-pulp

Boil sugar and water until it threads, beat egg-yolks until light and pour the sirup over them, beating constantly. Cook in a double boiler until the mixture coats a spoon. Remove from fire and chill. Add pulp and lemon-juice, whip cream until firm and fold into the mixture and freeze.

HOLIDAY CONSERVE

3 cups cranberries
1 cup diced apple
Juice and grated rind of 1 lemon
1 cup cooked crushed pineapple
1½ cups water
3 cups sugar

Cook cranberries and apple in the water until tender. Add pineapple, lemon and sugar. Mix well and cook rapidly until thick and clear. Turn into clean, hot glasses and when cold cover with paraffin.

CRANBERRY DIVINITY

1½ cups sugar
2 tablespoons white corn-sirup
½ cup water
1 egg-white
½ cup thick cranberry-pulp or candied cranberries

Cook sugar, sirup and water to firm-ball stage (246 degrees Fahrenheit). Pour slowly over the well-beaten white, beating constantly. Beat until mixture is stiff, add cranberry pulp, mix lightly and drop by spoonfuls on waxed paper. Sprinkle with finely chopped pistachio nuts.

SPICED CRANBERRIES

4 cups cranberries
5 cloves
3 cups sugar
5 allspice
2 sticks cinnamon
2 blades mace

Pick over and wash the berries. Place in a saucepan and cover with cold water. Tie spices in a cheese-cloth bag and drop in with the berries. Cook until the berries burst. Remove spices, add sugar, and cook until the mixture is clear. Chill.

Maybe your teeth are gloriously clear, simply clouded with a film coat. Make this remarkable test and find out.

Now!—A new way to lighten cloudy teeth —and without bleaching or harsh grit. The way foremost dentists now are urging for dazzling teeth and firm and healthy gums

DULL teeth, "off-color" teeth; gums that are softening, lacking firmness—modern science has made important, new discoveries in overcoming them.

Now, in as little as ten days, you can work a transformation in your mouth, can add immeasurably to your appearance and attractiveness.

This offers you a test without charge . . . the most remarkable, according to dental authorities, of all dental tests. In fairness to yourself, send the coupon.

FILM—your enemy. How it invites tooth and gum troubles

Dental science now traces scores of tooth and gum troubles, directly or indirectly, to a germ-laden film that forms on your teeth.

You can't see it with your eyes, but run your tongue across your teeth and you will feel it . . . a slippery, viscous coating.

That film absorbs discolorations from food, smoking, etc. And that is why your teeth look "off color" and dingy. It clings to teeth, gets into crevices and stays.

It lays your gums open to bacterial attack. Germs by the millions breed in it. And they, with tartar, are a chief cause of pyorrhea and decay.

Brushing won't end it

Ordinary dentifrices and cleansing won't fight film successfully. Feel for it now with your tongue. Note how your present cleansing method is failing in its duty.

Now new methods are being used. A dentifrice called Pepsodent—different in formula, action and effect from any other known.

It removes that film. And Firms the Gums

It accomplishes two important things at once: Removes that film, then firms the gums. No harsh grit, judged dangerous to enamel.

A few days' use will prove its power beyond all doubt. Why cling to old methods when world's authorities urge a better way?

If you place your sweater on a screen in front of an open window or radiator the air circulates freely and the sweater dries evenly

SAVE DOLLARS AND HOURS

Hints from successful housewives

If you have discovered some clever little way to save time or labor or fuel or food or anything else connected with housekeeping, tell us about it—and if we can use it in these columns we will pay you five dollars for it. Write on only one side of the paper, and address your letters to the "Savers" Editor, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y. (If you wish to have your suggestion returned in case we can not use it, please enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope)

SAVE TIME IN DRYING SWEATERS

A SWEATER can be dried quickly by using an ordinary window screen. Cover the screen with some thin cloth to protect the sweater, then lay the garment flat on the cloth and pat it into shape. Place the screen on two chairs near the stove or register, if possible, being sure that there is a free circulation of air around the screen.—M. E. McM., Cincinnati, Ohio.

SAVE BUYING A COAL-SCUTTLE

Roof cement and a little sand mixed together with enough water to give it the consistency of soft putty can be used to mend the coal-hod. When the bottom of the coal container begins to give way, clean the surface, then plaster it well with the cement and sand, using a putty knife. Sprinkle sand over the patch, and next day the coal-scuttle is ready to use.—MRS. E. B. H., Middletown, Conn.

SAVE TIME IN READING THE NEWSPAPER

While I prepare dinner, my thirteen-year-old son reads the headlines of the evening paper and I indicate the articles or news that interest me particularly. He reads them to me and we discuss them. This helps us both to be informed, saves time during the evening and incidentally I am able to discourage any interest he may show in the lurid, sensational news.—MRS. J. H. G., So. Tacoma, Wash.

SAVE LEFT-OVER MEAT AND ADD FLAVOR

If there is no gravy or stock to combine with left-over meat when making hash, use one or two bouillon cubes. Dissolve the cubes in hot water and add to the hash. These cubes give just the needed flavor.—MRS. L. C. F., Peoria, Ill.

SAVE "ADS" FOR SAMPLE STORE

After reading the magazine advertisements I clip out the coupons offering samples and sign them with an indelible pencil. This does not run like ink nor rub off like ordinary pencil. As the little sample packages arrive, they are carefully opened, the contents removed, and then pasted shut again. The children began their "store" with one of Libby's Toy Stores and have added "Cream of Wheat," "Grape Nuts," "Post Toasties," "Soaps," "Coffee," "Tapioca," etc. They use disks of cardboard for money and spend many an hour arranging their goods. They are learning arithmetic, courtesy, brands and trade-marks, as well as prices of standard commodities. The little containers are just like the real ones and no grocer can fool the children when I send for a certain brand.—MRS. R. F. M., San Francisco, Calif.

SAVE DISASTER FROM LEAKS

If the water-pipe suddenly begins to leak, it is possible to mend it in such a way that the plumber is not needed for some time. Wind the pipe well with adhesive tape, then brush the tape with shellac. A second coat may be added. We repaired such a pipe thirteen months ago and it is still in good condition.—MRS. A. P., Worcester, Mass.

SAVE SILK FROM KNITTED TIES

If the men of the family have a supply of knitted and crocheted ties which they have discarded, the ties may be unraveled and wound in balls. The silk, which is usually of excellent quality and color, is a great addition to the work-basket and may be used for fancy-work or any other purpose where heavy silk is required.—C. M. M., New York, N. Y.

SAVE TEMPER WHEN OPENING BUREAU DRAWERS

What housekeeper has not been irritated and delayed by having the drawer of a bureau stick? Unless the sticking is caused by swelling of the wood, it can be overcome by the use of floor-wax, wax or tallow from a candle or even soap. The edges of the drawer and the space above them where the drawer slides into the space should be rubbed with the lubricant. The drawer will then slide very easily.—R. N. B., Greene, N. Y.

SAVE WRINGING HOT CLOTHS

A new use for a potato-ricer is as a substitute for the hands when wringing hot cloths needed in case of sickness. It not only enables one to use very hot water, but saves the hands. This is particularly true if hot applications must be continued for some time.—MRS. W. F., Lake City, Minn.

SAVE THE ELBOWS OF SWEATERS

When the elbow of a sweater shows signs of wear, I change the sleeves about so that the worn places come on the inside of the arm. It is necessary to shrink this part of the sleeve, and I do this by covering it with a wet cloth and pressing with a hot iron. While the sweater will not look as if it were new, it may be made to look very well and its usefulness prolonged.—L. B. J., Seattle, Wash.

SAVE CLEANING PILLOWS

Cover your bed-pillows with a close-fitting white cotton cover. Baste at the end. The pillow-slips will look much whiter than is possible if the colored pillow-ticking shows through, making it look yellow or streaked. The white cotton cover is much simpler to wash than is the pillow itself to clean, and the slip makes the cleaning of the pillow itself unnecessary.—MRS. C. W., Reedsburg, Wis.

MY FRIEND Jim's wife is deeply troubled. Recently Jim was operated on for gall-stones and the getting-well process was slow and painful. The doctor, on learning Jim's food habits—his fondness for bread, meat and potatoes, his satisfaction in rich foods, his aversion to vegetables, his lukewarm attitude to fruit, his distaste for milk—told her that they have been largely to blame for Jim's downfall. To give emphasis to his statement he brought in to her an abstract from a recent article in a scientific journal, which read as follows:

> The longer I observe children and people in general, the more I am convinced that many of the ills of middle life—constipation, chronic indigestion . . . gall-stones . . . gastric ulcer and gastric cancer—have their origin away back in that remote period of childhood when all unconsciously the very foods that would have guaranteed long life and good health were excluded from the diet.

This set her to thinking. Where Jim's threatened shipwreck of health was at first her only concern, she soon began to wonder about the three children. Were their food habits such that they too were headed for similar disaster? All of them suffered more or less from constipation and needed rather frequent dosing. Digestive upsets were not uncommon. Little Mary was very meager in outline and John and James were too sallow. Colds were numerous. Yet they were active, vigorous youngsters and she had consoled herself with hoping that time would correct these ills that she had thought of as small, and that the children would, in the current phrase, "outgrow" their difficulties.

She became actively conscious of the fact that little Mary—the apple of Jim's eye—already shared most of her father's food prejudices. John and James, lustier specimens of humanity than Mary, had also some regrettable likes and dislikes. There were very few vegetables they would eat; salads they scorned and fruit they regarded with only mild interest. Milk, fortunately, they still liked and used in abundance.

Mrs. Jim is a courageous woman. She faced her situation squarely and set to work on a program of family reform. Wherein was she at fault for the situation now existing? Was it weakness on her part in choosing the easy way? Were she and Jim setting the right example for the children? Had they met their obligations in this respect?

IT WAS in this frame of mind that Mrs. B. came for help. First, what should Jim eat to hasten his recovery and what did he need to keep him well? Jim, having had a very severe lesson, was ready to reeducate himself in any necessary way. Secondly, what must she do for the children to keep them from repeating their father's sad experience?

In any home where the family has food habits that carry its members to doctor and dietitian there is a two-fold problem to face. Both aspects of the problem are, in the truest sense of the word, concerned with behavior.

Jim with his gall-stone tragedy is an illustration of this. Some part of his body had acquired a habit of bad conduct—so bad in fact that an operation had been necessary to remove the difficulties resulting. In Jim's case faulty diet was a very possible underlying cause. The food which he habitually sent to his tissues had not been of a kind to keep them normally braced and built, and they got to acting wrongly.

Fortunately for Jim, in spite of an acute disaster, the bad habits his tissues had fallen into are not so deep-seated that they will not change once they are reeducated and given the help they need through right food. He is lucky to have got at it early enough to accomplish the changes which must take place before he is safely over his difficulties.

The work to be done with cases like that of the Jim family is much more difficult than just to correct by operation and reeducation tissues that through their bad habits have caused disease. Jim's permanent cure and the future protection of his whole family involve further and more serious problems of behavior. We can no longer evade the fact that our simple every-day habits of eating, of cleanliness, of sleeping, of rest are just as much a part of our conduct as the telling of truth or the way we have in relationship to the rights of others.

The Jim family as a whole has poor food habits. In other words, in this respect the family has poor conduct, is badly behaved. The very first task which Jim and Mrs. Jim have to face, therefore, is to reeducate themselves in terms of their own food habits. They now realize the necessity of furnishing the right example for their children. Jim's disaster has made them both highly conscious of this and desirous of doing it. They must in addition set about the business of redirecting the food habits of their three children. This is not going to be so easy. The children quite naturally have not had the same emotional stimulus as that experienced by the mother and father to make them anxious to change habits of long standing. They are too young to realize this "right about face" of their parents, and it will take appreciable time to make them see the real meaning of it. Both Jim and Mrs. Jim have been made to see the necessity for patience, for courage and for understanding in the necessary reeducation of this part of their children's conduct. The Jim family is on the up-grade and in time they will have once more adapted themselves to normal behavior with regard to food.

Milk, fruits and vegetables as a part of the daily food of each member of the family have come to be recognized by them as essential alike to physical structure and to moral fiber. They realize that conduct may find right or wrong expression in food habits as much as in any other habits which govern human lives. They have gained further an insight into the obligation which parents have to set the right example of good food habits for their children to follow—and to see that they follow them.

WHERE ARE THE FORKS?

ASK US

Ask us anything you want to know about housekeeping and we will answer it personally. From our recent correspondence we publish the following questions and answers as being of general interest to all home-makers

QUESTION—What is the secret of making waffles crisp?

Answer—Use a comparatively thin batter. Select waffle recipe in which fat is used generously. Bake the waffles slowly enough to crisp them through. Select a waffle-iron which will bake a thin instead of a thick waffle. Except when using an electric waffle-iron, grease the iron abundantly.

The following waffle recipe is vouched for by the home-making editor as being superfine:

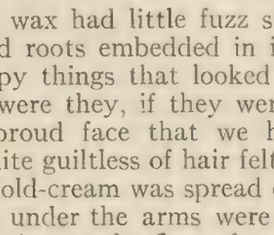
1 cup sour milk
¼ teaspoon soda
2 egg-yolks
2 tablespoons butter or other fat melted
1 cup flour
2 teaspoons baking-powder
½ teaspoon salt
2 egg-whites beaten stiff but not dry

Mix sour milk, soda, egg-yolks, melted fat and beat until frothy. Add flour mixed and sifted with baking-powder and salt. Fold in the beaten egg-whites.

Question—What shall I do to the white tile floor in my bathroom? I was told to use muriatic acid to whiten it and although it did whiten it at first the floor is now grayer than ever.

Answer—The acid actually removed some of the substance of the tile, leaving it momentarily white and more than ever porous and free to furnish a foothold for dirt.

If the floor is thoroughly cleaned and then dried, the addition of a very thin coating of wax will tend to prevent the soil from getting into the tile itself.



Question—Is there any way to keep an unfinished hardwood floor clean except by scrubbing it?

Answer—I know of no way except to oil the floor, and of course that is in reality a finish. To do this, clean and dry the floor thoroughly. Then rub into it a mixture of equal parts of boiled linseed oil and turpentine, leaving no excess on the surface. Let this stand overnight, and wipe up with cold water. Keep this floor clean by mopping with cold water. Repeat the treatment several times a year. It will darken the floor, but will save much scrubbing.

Question—How can I clean my painted woodwork?

Answer—There are three satisfactory methods:

1. Make light suds of warm water and mild soap. Wet a cloth in the soapy water and wring nearly dry. Rub the paint, and if this does not remove the dirt, use a fine friction powder. Rinse with clear water and wipe dry.
2. Moisten a cloth with kerosene and rub the paint with it until clean. Wipe dry with another cloth. The room will have to be aired afterward, if this method be used.
3. Use one tablespoon of kerosene to one quart of warm water. Wash the woodwork with a cloth wrung out of this solution. Wipe with a dry cloth.

HAIR THAT WAS NEVER INVITED

First she did our face, on which we had thought there was no fuzz. Talcum powder sifted on to soften the blow, then the wax spread on as warm as one can stand it, spread always in the direction the hair grows, with a rough edge at the bottom so that one can get firm and easy hold of it, then left only long enough to be firm and manageable, but never, never long enough to be cold (it's letting it get cold that makes it hurt), then the whole piece caught up and flipped off. We braced ourself when we knew it was coming and told ourself firmly not to wince. But, prrrt, off! And there was not a shred of hurt or pain of any sort!

And the wax had little fuzz standing up from it and roots embedded in it—anyway round, pulpy things that looked like roots; and what were they, if they weren't roots? And our proud face that we had always thought quite guiltless of hair felt as smooth as silk. Cold-cream was spread on and left. Arms, legs, under the arms were done with no interruption to the flow of conversation. In fact we got so thrilled with the process that we asked to do it ourself so that we could talk straight to any of you who, 'way off there somewhere, had to do it all by yourself. You melt it up in a little tin cup over canned heat or a low gas-burner, then when it drips like warm molasses or "hairs" like candy, you spread it on thick with the back of a teaspoon, only always powder the skin with talcum first. Then when it is lukewarm and firm (oh, never, never let any one ice your wax as some places do; it closes the pores and breaks off the hair and hurts, and never, never forget to put astringent on immediately afterward to close the pores and guard against infection), catch hold of the rough edge, and don't pull it up or out but sort of roll it back; always take it off against the way the hair grows; fold it back swiftly and lift it off. When you do your upper lip, hold the skin with finger and thumb, and then with the finger and thumb of the other hand roll it with a lot of snap back to the center of the lip and then do the other side just the same way. Be sure always to put on a soothing cold cream and an astringent immediately afterward.

At the end of the treatment our skin felt like silk all over, and there had been no suffering at all except a bit when they did the back of the neck where the roots were deep and the hair strong. Then we stopped talking philosophy and said "Ouch!" That was all. And it's worth suffering, if the bottom of your bob is not naturally a graceful, lovely line, or your hair is dark and the barber's trimming leaves a shadow and makes you look not quite tidy and clean!

We walked away from that House of Wax on air! And it is six weeks now and we are quite as enthusiastic as ever. The stronger hair has come back, but soft and not so thick; not at all like stubble, and all the soft, fine hair hasn't appeared in the least! Oh, my friends, nobody, not anybody needs to suffer humiliation because of superfluous hair. You can buy enough wax to do the whole body for not much money at all, and you can melt it over and over again many, many times. Of course strong, deep-rooted hair will fight longer, but each time it will grow a little weaker, the hairs farther apart, not so close and strong. And finally, you will have to do it only once in a great while and perhaps not at all.

I can't say that it is a hundred per cent. cure, but I can say, "I believe!" You remember that old nursery song:

Who's afraid!
Every goblin known of old
Perished long ago, I'm told.
Every witch on broomstick ri-iding
Has been burned or is in hiding!
Who's afraid!

Beauty, the kind of beauty that wears, and holds and holds, goes much deeper, we know, than the roots of hairs. But we know, too, from those heart-breaking letters on the left, that that luminous, unfailing beauty that comes from trying to see everybody as a little bit of God-substance shot out from the Source of All, as the earth was shot off from the sun, trying to understand and love that wandering bit of God, and help, if you can, trying to see every "bad" thing that happens to you as something you needed to make you grow and never a cause of despair—even that real beauty is sometimes dimmed by external disfigurement, shaking your confidence in yourself so that you can not shine like the "light on a hill" you were meant to be.

Therefore we write a letter on hair that was never invited, and our last and sincere word to you is, send it away—you can; it was not invited and it spoils the party!

A Message of Beauty to Every Woman

HELENA RUBINSTEIN
Internationally known Scientist of the Complexion

MADAME RUBINSTEIN has spent nearly thirty years in helping to make women happy, and men too, for some man's happiness is always dependent on some woman. The science of complexions is a profession with Helena Rubinstein! She serves her organizations in the capacities of Skin Specialist and Chemist.

All of her famous Valaze Beauty Preparations are made in her own laboratories under her personal direction. The ingredients that go into them are known to her alone. But the underlying principle and the secret of her success, she shares with all women. It is a very simple one:

"MAKE YOUR SKIN WORK" for the active skin is a beautiful skin

With this simple, yet all embracing principle ever before her, Mme. Rubinstein has created her preparations, among which you will find no heavy, clogging creams, but the elements that your skin needs if it is to function perfectly.

At this time of the year, especially, when the skin needs clearing and whitening after the summer's exposure at the beach or mountains—you will appreciate Valaze Beautifying Skinfood, the marvelous cream which clears up the darkened skin pigment and whitens the skin beautifully.

THE NEEDS OF EVERY SKIN

Cleansing and Nourishing

Valaze Pasteurized Face Cream—of exquisite velvety texture, cleanses, soothes, nourishes, moulds out the tired lines and revitalizes the skin. The only cleansing cream that for oily, pimpled and acne blemished skins, will be most beneficial.
4 oz. $1.00. ½ lb. $2.00.

Valaze Beauty Grains—an occasional face bath with this gently penetrative soap substitute is necessary to refine the texture, clear the skin of imbedded dust and impart that much to be desired transparency. $1.00, $2.00

Stimulating

Valaze Beautifying Skinfood (clear skin cream)—is embodying the principle of Mme. Rubinstein's success as a scientist of the complexion.

Promotes the renewal of cells, and thus stands for skin health. It encourages the skin's activity. The good complexion acquires longer life, and the faded skin is delightfully rejuvenated. Excellent for sallowness, tan and freckles. $1.00, $2.00

Valaze Skin-toning Lotion—should always follow the use of the Valaze Beautifying Skinfood; it closes the pores, tones and braces the skin, prevents wrinkles, a mild astringent with no drying effects. $1.25, $2.50

For dry skins, Valaze Skin-toning Lotion (Special) $1.25, $2.25, $4.50

The Oily Skin Needs

Valaze Blackhead and Open Pore Paste—a soap substitute to remove blackheads and keep the pores small and active. $1.00, $2.00

Valaze Liquidine—corrects oily skin and "shiny nose", mildly astringent, imparts flattering finish. $1.50, $2.75

The Dry Skin Needs

Valaze Grecian Anti-Wrinkle Cream (Anthosoros)—richly nourishing for thin faces and necks: corrects and prevents crowsfeet, lines, wrinkles, and hollows. $1.75, $3.50

To Emphasize Your Beauty

In these days of accepted make-up it is the smart woman who exercises care that her choice of cosmetics should emphasize but not exaggerate her type. Mme Rubinstein has created rouges of the most flattering shades and powders of the most exquisite tints that insure protection as well as beauty adorned.

Valaze Red Geranium Rouge (new), the shade created by Mme. Rubinstein on her recent visit to Paris, vivid, sparkling, made to glorify youth. $1.00

Valaze Red Raspberry Rouge, an original Valaze creation, universally becoming to every type. $1.00

Valaze Crushed Rose Leaves—the rouge for the conservative woman—ideal for the woman with silvering hair. $1.00

Valaze Lipsticks in shades to match rouges. .50, $1.00

Valaze Complexion Powder in tints to suit every skin. $1.00, $1.50, $3.00

Valaze Novena Powder in all tints (made especially for the very dry and sensitive skin.) $1.00, $1.50, $3.00

The new edition of "Secrets of Beauty" with full instructions for home treatments for all types of skins may be had for the asking. Mme. Rubinstein wishes every woman to feel free to visit any of her salons for advice and instruction or to write directly to her.

Every Valaze Salon de Beaute has skilled attendants trained by Mme. Rubinstein herself in her Paris or London Salons.

"I bought it without touching my savings!"

"$6.25 DOWN!—that was all I paid to have my Hoover delivered. Each day I put away a few cents. By the end of the month I had more than enough to meet the small payment. And now it's mine—all paid for!" No wonder he's proud of her. In fact, she's just a little proud of herself. And happy, too! For she has found in The Hoover her complete home-cleaning servant. It beats her rugs—and she's discovered they need beating. (You can prove this, too*...) It sweeps her rugs, electrically. It suction-cleans, and does all her "dusting." It saves a lot of her time and most of her labor. Her rugs wear longer—and how beautiful they are! You'd be proud, too, if you were in her place. When will you be? Your Authorized Hoover Dealer will deliver your Hoover for $6.25 down. And you, too, can buy it without touching your savings.

The HOOVER

It BEATS ... as it Sweeps as it Cleans

*TO PROVE RUGS NEED BEATING: Turn over a corner of a rug; with the handle of an ordinary table-knife, or something of equal weight, give the under or warp side 15 to 25 sharp taps and watch the dirt dance out from the nap depths onto a piece of paper. Feel the destructive character of this grit. This is the dirt your present cleaning methods have missed, and that beating has dislodged. Correct use of The Hoover causes this embedded dirt to be vibrated to the surface by the rapid, gentle beating of the Hoover brush, as powerful suction lifts the rug from the floor and draws all the beaten-out, swept-up dirt into the dust-tight bag

ASK THE DELINEATOR

If you have any questions to ask about your cooking or housekeeping problems, about building or furnishing your home, about your child's care and training, about beauty, or any household or personal question, consult us. Be sure (1) to address your inquiry to THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.; (2) to give us your return address; (3) to enclose a two-cent stamp for return postage on a free leaflet, and sufficient stamps or checks whenever an additional amount is fixed to cover the cost of printing and postage

Your Child's Care and Training—Dr. Henry L. K. Shaw, Director of The Happy Child Department, answers personal letters and also writes a monthly letter to the members of The Happy Child Clubs. For details about these clubs see The Happy Child Page.

From this department you may also secure a group of valuable pamphlets on child welfare.

Fifteen titles in the Child Health Series form a helpful mothers' library. The price of each is ten cents:

1. The Expectant Mother and the New Baby.
2. The General Care of the Baby.
3. The Importance of Correct Posture.
4. Maternal Nursing.
5. Artificial Feeding in Baby's First Year.

Keeping House and Getting Meals—Martha Van Rensselaer and her staff at Cornell University are glad to help you with any cooking or housekeeping problems. Information on planning meals, recipes for all sorts of dishes, housekeeping equipment and its use, nutrition and special diets—all this will be sent you by the Home-Making Department.

Miss Van Rensselaer will mail you a complete list of the leaflets on home-making that have been prepared in her department.

When You Build or Furnish—Write to Mrs. Charles Bradley Sanders, Director of the Department of House Decoration and Home Building. When you ask Mrs. Sanders about furnishing and decorating, give a full description of your rooms—and don't ask more than five questions in one letter—please! Write for pictures of the sixteen houses designed for THE DELINEATOR by Donn Barber. From these pictures you may order (for one dollar) a blue-print of the floor-plans and elevations of the house you decide upon.

Mrs. Sanders's special bulletins will help you furnish your home tastefully. They cost only twenty-five cents each and are attractively written and illustrated—Good Floors; Curtains and Draperies; Walls, Woodwork and Ceilings; Furnishing the Home; How to Choose, Frame and Hang Your Pictures; How to Know Good Furniture; Methods of Painting Furniture and Slip-Covers and How to Make Them.

Your Skin, Your Hair, Your Weight—Any question of good looks will be cheerfully answered by Celia Caroline Cole, our Beauty Editor. If you weigh more than you should, send twenty-five cents for our booklet, Reducing in Spots. This gives you exercises that reduce just the too-plump spots that bother you—the fat ankles or hips or double chin.

The Correct Thing—Ticklish little questions of table etiquette, correct form in introductions, in correspondence, confront one at every turn. If you are not quite sure on any point, write to Mrs. John Cabot Kimberly.

For Successful Parties—Margaret Campion parties are always delightful revels. For Thanksgiving she has an ANCESTOR PARTY that your guests will long remember. If you like stunt parties, there's VAUDEVILLE VELOCITY with some easy amateur stunts. An INDOOR NUTTING PARTY is a gem of clever rimes and contests. Ask her for entertainment suggestions for any age or occasion and she will help you.

ATTIC FLOORS AND CELLARETTES

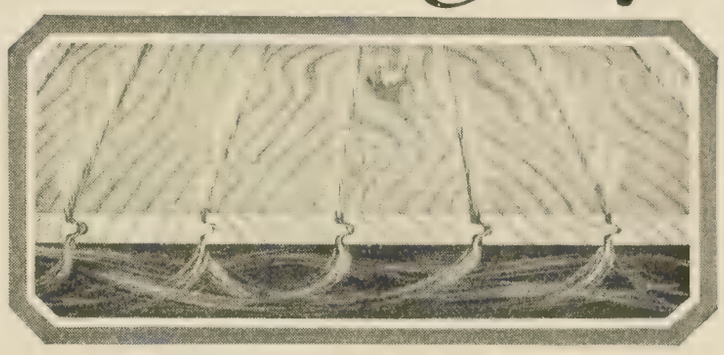
On account of the existing quantity of smoke and soot, curtain materials should be tubfast or of a material easily dry-cleanable. The sunfasts are always a joy, but for the more informal living-quarters, the new reversible casements and the water-proof chintz are a delight. The little French prints, tissue and plain ginghams, sunfast cretonnes, Russian crash, muslins and linen gauzes make charming window hangings.

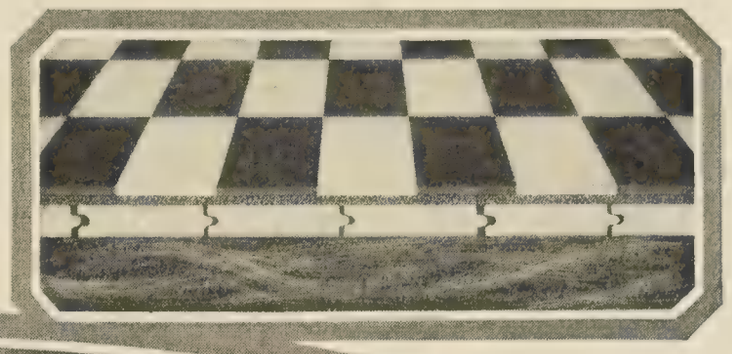
UNFORTUNATELY the lack of closet space, built-in features and funds usually go hand-in-hand when establishing an apartment home. To overcome these limitations, every device from buying furniture at auction to turning carpenter and painter must be used. Ornate, glass-fronted bookcases, bureaus, old sideboards and china-closets make surprizingly appropriate and pretty furnishings for apartments when painted or stained to match. The soft reds, terra-cotta, blues, oranges, greens, black and grays are gay colors which, when combined, outlined or stenciled with dainty flowers and fruits, are appropriate colors for the more informal furnishings. Unpainted furniture which is well made and copied from almost every good type of eighteenth-century piece has lightness and grace, and is most interesting and practical for apartment use.

It is just as bad for small apartment furniture to be too small as it is to be too large, and to find the right scale is not always easy. It is wise first to measure for the important pieces before they are purchased. Chairs, tables, beds, etc., should be chosen for comfort and modesty of size. Breakfast-room sets, for example, consisting of hutches and drop-leaf tables are far more suitable than dining-room suites with large extension tables, sideboards, serving tables and china-closets. For those who must combine dining-room and living-room, drop-leaf and gate-leg tables serve well. The new combination living and dining-room table is a welcome innovation indeed, and a graceful well-built piece of furniture. Do not, however, with these types of dining-tables, make the mistake of buying dining-room chairs. Small wooden painted, reed or rush bottom ones will do nicely, and can be used throughout the apartment. The wooden settle, with a round or square table back, is one solution of a disappearing table, and an adjustable table-top which can be folded and put away is another.



The davenports, which, when open, make a comfortable bed, are just the thing for the unexpected guest or the bachelor girl who must combine her living-room and bedroom. Day beds, box couches, and the new magic table which unfolds into a single or double bed, are other pieces designed unmistakably for small apartment homes.

Built-in features are perhaps the biggest space savers. At either side of and over a fireplace, radiators, in corners, between doors, under and between windows are likely places for book-shelves, whose upper layers may be adorned with bits of brass and pottery. In dining-rooms and kitchens, where cupboard space is not sufficient, hanging shelves and condemned doorways make convenient places for china, pots or pans.



Grippy children and doctors' bills go hand in hand with draughty floors

Why linoleum, cemented over felt, is a warm, health-protecting floor

By C. N. WENRICH, PH. D.
Formerly head of the Dept. of Physics, University of Pittsburgh

The constant expansion and contraction of the best wood floors is bound to create draughty spaces between the boards. The picture to the left is intended to show how the invisible air currents rush through these spaces.

The picture to the right is intended to show how a floor of Armstrong's Linoleum, cemented over builders' felt, prevents the passage of draughts through the boards of the underfloors.

"HOW often one hears an anxious mother exclaim, 'Sonny, don't play on that draughty floor!' And very likely mother is right, too. For the average floor, with its cracks and spaces between boards, allows cold air to rush through like a partially opened window.

"Where the protection of health is considered before all else—in the modern hospital—you will find linoleum floors most commonly used. And why do you suppose this is so? Because linoleum, properly laid, is not only a sanitary, easily cleaned floor, but is a warm, non-draughty floor as well.

"In the first place, linoleum when cemented over deadening felt has absolutely no cracks or crevices for draughts to pour through. But there is another reason why linoleum floors are warmer, healthier. Genuine linoleum is made largely of cork and oxidized linseed oil pressed onto a burlap back. Now, every housewife has daily evidence of the extremely high nonconducting qualities of cork. Take your ice-box, for example: the cork in its walls retards the melting of the ice because the air within the chest is kept cold. The cork also prevents the heated air in the kitchen from entering through the ice-box walls.

"This simple illustration demonstrates how linoleum floors help exclude winter's cold, and how they help to maintain an even temperature by sealing the floor against draughts between the floor boards.

"I have conducted many tests in a scientific attempt to determine just how efficient a nonconductor of heat Armstrong's Linoleum is. Its heat insulating value is exceptionally high. I can say that the modern method of laying linoleum (over a felt lining) makes it a warm floor—warmer even than wood."

C. N. Wenrich

This rich marble tile inlaid pattern of Armstrong's Linoleum (No. 73) is in a San Francisco apartment designed by Lionel H. Pries, architect. Notice how well the fine oriental rug and rich hangings show against this pattern floor. Pattern No. 75 shown in doorway.

The modern method of laying linoleum

Beautiful, fine linoleum, such as Armstrong's, should never be tacked in place. Instead, good stores will first paste a layer of builders' deadening felt to the old underfloor. The linoleum is then cemented down and waterproof cement applied to the seams and edges. Directly after the floor is laid, your furniture and fabric rugs can be replaced—and then what a truly ideal floor you have! Waxed and polished occasionally, it need never feel the scrubbing brush. In fact, your dry mop will remove all dirt and dust from your linoleum floor, because there will be surface accumulation only.

Planning interiors with the new linoleum patterns

Write to Mrs. Hazel Dell Brown, the interior decorator in charge of our Bureau of Decoration. She will gladly send you suggestions for drapes, walls, and floors. In the meantime, write for the new book by Agnes Foster Wright on the planning of home decoration. Mrs. Wright, former President of the Interior Decorators' League of New York, has produced a book full of the most helpful suggestions for beautifying the home. It is called "Floors, Furniture, and Color." Sent for 25 cents postpaid (60 cents in Canada). Armstrong Cork Company, Linoleum Division, 884 West Walnut Street, Lancaster, Pa.

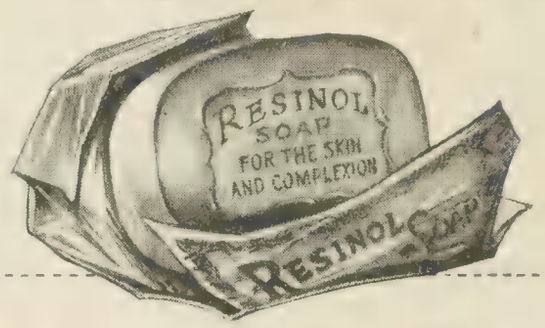
There is no substitute in woman's beauty for a flawless skin

"And on the liquid mirror glow'd
The clear perfection of her face."
Tennyson.

THOUGH poets and authors in their praise of woman's beauty describe her luxuriant hair, soulful eyes, classic features or perfect mouth, all these lose their loveliness if her complexion is dull or lifeless.

A clear, satin-like skin creates a daintiness of appearance which heightens beauty of feature and is in itself woman's chief charm. Many women fail to possess this charm because they do not know how to care for the skin.



For proper cleansing, soap should be used once a day—but it must be the right kind. RESINOL SOAP is ideal for every skin and will stand any test of purity. Its particular fragrance as well as its rich color is your guarantee for the healthful Resinol properties it contains.

No heavy perfume is required to conceal inferior quality. Buy a cake from your druggist or toilet goods dealer, and bathe your face with it tonight. Note how readily it lathers, how gently but thoroughly it cleanses the pores, how easily it rinses, how soft, velvety and refreshed it leaves your skin.

But don't let your treatment be too harsh! Many a woman ruins her beauty at the start by scrubbing her face with a rough cloth and hot water, when she should use lukewarm water and a soft cloth—or better still—her finger tips. The rinsing should be thorough, and the skin dried carefully by patting lightly with a soft towel.

Where blemishes are already present, apply a little Resinol Ointment and see how quickly it clears them away. This soothing, healing ointment is also unexcelled for the relief of itching, burning skin troubles, boils, chafings, scratches, etc. Your druggist sells the Resinol products. No home should be without them.

of the leg, which support the arch and flex the foot and the toes on the leg—that is, pull the foot upward toward the leg. Ultimately, of course, the ligaments of the foot and the foot muscles become weakened. Flat foot is due also to faulty posture in walking and standing, especially to the habit of toeing out, and the wearing of improperly shaped shoes or badly fitting shoes. A shoe with a straight inner edge should be worn. Such shoes of various makes can be had from your shoe-dealer if you demand them.

The fundamental difficulty is weakness of the leg and foot muscles, and this should be corrected by systematic, patient exercise. The exercise most highly regarded in the United States Army is as follows:

Stand with feet parallel and somewhat apart, great toes gripping the ground. Without bending the knees or moving the feet, rotate the thighs outward repeatedly. This is chiefly done by strong contraction of the great muscles of the back of the thigh and seat.

Other exercises that are helpful for flat foot follow:

1. Stand with the ball of the foot on the edge of a board or table or similar structure, so that the toes may be freely bent downward. Bend the toes up and down over this edge thirty times twice daily.
2. While standing on the flat surface, lift the toes thirty times.
3. Separate the toes thirty times by use of the foot and toe muscles. This may require some assistance with the hands until the trick is acquired.
4. Stand with the back to the wall, heels on the ground and against the wall. Raise the front of the foot as far as possible, thirty times.
5. Rest on the outer margins of the feet. Curl the toes inward and backward under the feet as far as possible, thirty times.
6. Place marbles about one-half inch in diameter on the floor. Try to pick them up with feet, curling the toes around them.

The effect of exercises to strengthen the arches is to cause the patient to walk with the weight more on the outer border of the foot than the inner border. This is also accomplished by raising the inner side of the sole and heel of the shoes about a quarter of an inch. Any cobbler can do this by inserting leather strips or wedges in the sole, but the work should be inspected by a physician or an experienced shoe-fitter to prevent further injury to the foot through faulty workmanship.

Other common defects found in women, with corrective measures for their elimination or improvement, follow:

FALLEN STOMACH OR RELAXED ABDOMEN

Exercise 1 (Fig. 1)

(For illustrations see page 21)

1. Sit on low stool with feet under the edge of a bed or other support.
2. Place hands on hips or across chest.
3. Lower trunk backward slowly to horizontal position and recover. Repeat five to ten times.

Exercise 2 (Fig. 2)

1. Lie supinely on the floor or bed.
2. Clasp hands behind head.
3. Point toes and raise legs slowly to vertical position and slowly recover. Keep toes pointed and knees straight. Bend only at hips. Repeat ten to twelve times.

FLAT AND NARROW CHEST

Exercise 1 (Fig. 4)

1. Stand erect, feet slightly spread, toes pointing straight ahead, hands at sides.
2. Raise arms slowly sideward to horizontal position and inhale. Fill the lungs to capacity during this count.
3. Circle arms backward in small circle three to five times while holding breath.
4. Lower arms slowly to side and exhale; repeat five times; rest and continue. This may be combined with foot and lower leg exercise by rising on toes as arms are raised and remaining on toes till arms are lowered.

Exercise 2 (Fig. 5)

1. Stand erect with arms at thrust—that is, with elbows at sides, and clenched fists in front of chest.
2. Alternate, thrusting arms sideward and upward over head.

Exercise 3 (Fig. 6)

1. Stand erect, hands clasped behind head.
2. Bend head backward and forward slowly, chin in, against slight pressure of hands.
3. Inhale as head moves backward, and exhale as head moves forward. Repeat fifteen times.

IRREGULAR SHOULDERS

(Fig. 3)

1. Stand erect with feet slightly spread, toes pointing straight ahead.
2. Place arms at thrust.
3. Thrust forcibly upward with one arm (arm on side of lower shoulder) and downward with other. Thrust alternately ten times, then strike with both arms simultaneously ten times.

ROUND SHOULDERS

1. Stand erect with a book or other weight in each hand.
2. Lean forward, extending arms forward with hands in front of waist.
3. Straighten the trunk and at same time swing the arms backward behind the hips. Repeat eight to ten times.

WEAK BACK

Exercise 1 (Fig. 7)

1. Stand erect, feet about eighteen inches apart, toes pointing straight ahead, arms extended horizontally sideward with palms up.
2. Raise right arm and lower left arm about 45 per cent., keeping them stretched out straight and opposite each other.
3. Turn body to left, bringing right arm over in front of face and left arm behind.
4. Continue twisting body, and bend trunk forward until right hand touches the floor at outside of left foot.
5. Reverse; and repeat five to ten times.

Exercise 2 (Fig. 8)

1. Stand with feet together, hands behind neck, finger-tips touching, elbows back.
2. Bend trunk forward and recover. Keep elbows well back all the time, head up and shoulders flat. All bending at the hips. Repeat six to ten times.

Exercise 3

1. Lie supinely on floor or bed.
2. Raise trunk.
3. Reach forward with hands touching toes, six to ten times.

Some cities have special corrective gymnasium classes where these exercises may be taken, but the women who will give a little thought and time to them can take them at home just as well. Some people find it more pleasant to go through the exercises to the rhythm of music. If you are one of these, use the radio or talking machine. But the essential thing is to be systematic and regular about it. Reserve a definite period in your daily schedule for your exercises. Make this as much a part of your regular routine as washing. If you do this you will find that it will pay large dividends in terms of increased vigor and health, better poise and grace and the confidence that comes with feeling fit.

SAFE AND SANE REDUCING

Diet—of course—if you want to lose your surplus pounds. But do not take rash steps that endanger health.

Starving on one meal a day or on one kind of fruit or vegetable may bring you down very quickly. But you gain just as quickly when you go back to "regular" food. And the whole process is contrary to the rules of health.

It's easy to reduce, though—and stay reduced—if you follow a well-balanced diet and exercise. You will be surprised to see how many good things there are in the non-fattening world.

"Don't You Want to Be Thinner?"—a leaflet that we'll send you for just a two-cent stamp to cover postage—gives you menus that tell you just what you should and should not eat. Address the Service Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

The GOSSARD Line of Beauty within Reach of Every Woman

YOU may find figure garments that equal Gossards in price—possibly in material—but never in design. In ability to fit, to wear, to bring fashion and utter comfort, Gossard garments stand out alone—because of their exclusive, careful designing and tailoring.

You may need only a little girdle to keep your figure perfect. Or it may be advisable to wear a Combination, a Step-in, an Elastic Belvadear, a Rubber Reducing Garment, or a Front Lacing Corset. But whatever it is that gives you the correct foundation—Gossard makes it—Gossard makes all types of figure garments, sold at the best stores everywhere—the Gossard label in each Gossard garment. That means value.

Model 874—A short Clasp-around made from beautiful brocade and hand loomed elastic. Trimmed with dainty lace and French flowers. Two pairs hose supporters. Pink. Sizes 24-34. Price $8.50.

The Slouch is passe!

Paris says with emphasis that the debutante slouch has gone the way of all unattractive fashions—the woman with erect carriage, the slim, firm figure, the quick, springy step today is the woman of fashion and beauty. Proper foundation garments are absolutely essential to good figure lines.

4 out of 5

Dental statistics show that four out of every five over 40—and thousands younger, too—are victims of dreaded Pyorrhea. Will you escape?

Pyorrhea is a disease of the gums—not the teeth

That's one outstanding fact everybody should know. And if everybody did know it, the number of Pyorrhea's victims would soon be greatly reduced.

You may take splendid care of your teeth—brush them several times a day—and still get Pyorrhea. Once Pyorrhea secures a firm hold, pus pockets form, gums become weak and flabby, the teeth loosen and fall out no matter how white and sound they may be.

Forhan's means healthy gums

It contains the right proportion of Forhan's Astringent, as used by the dental profession in the treatment of Pyorrhea. Forhan's protects and preserves the gums, keeping them in a firm, pink, healthy condition; cleans and whitens the teeth, and keeps the mouth sweet, fresh and wholesome. If you don't care to discontinue the tooth paste you are now using, at least brush your teeth and gums once a day with Forhan's.

Forhan's is more than a tooth paste; it checks Pyorrhea. Thousands have found it beneficial for years. For your own sake ask for Forhan's For the Gums. All druggists, 35c and 60c in tubes.

kidneys are affected and that the most skilful and constant medical care is needed to avoid a disaster, and even when the symptoms of kidney disease are recovered from only too frequently the kidneys are left permanently damaged. Another cause for a sudden rise of temperature at this time is so-called scarlatinal rheumatism.

BETWEEN the mildest cases and those of the most virulent type scarlet fever exhibits every shade of severity. Fortunately, as already noted, the prevailing type of the disease, at least in this country, is one of comparative mildness. Indeed, many patients with scarlet fever seem to be but little affected, the temperature and pulse rate are but slightly elevated, the throat symptoms mild and the rash scanty and often difficult to make out even by the most careful examination. Nevertheless, even such cases may go wrong and be followed by one of the severe complications already mentioned; furthermore, such cases are fully capable of communicating the disease to others whose resistance may not be as strong and in whom the disease may run a very severe course. Even though the majority of cases of scarlet fever are to-day of a mild or moderately severe type, we continue to see some of extreme severity in which the patient is suddenly struck down by the intensity of the infection, even before the rash has time to fully develop. The temperature and pulse rise with dramatic suddenness and death takes place within forty-eight hours or even less.

WHEN TO SUSPECT PERSONS OF SCARLET FEVER

WHEN a child beyond six months suddenly vomits and seems to be feverish, the temperature should be taken immediately and the throat examined in a good light without delay. The point of entrance of scarlet fever, as already noted, is the throat and nose, and it is in the throat that the first evidence of it is to be found. The throat may not be very red, but if not at all inflamed scarlet fever may be confidently excluded. Just here it should be stated that all parents and others having the care of young children should learn to examine their throats, and to that end a child should be taught to have the throat examined. It is a simple procedure requiring but a few seconds and readily learned, but in the hands of the uninstructed is a bungling and uninformative undertaking. How to examine a throat should be taught in all first-aid classes, to boy and girl scouts and campfire girls, and to all older school children. By this simple and harmless procedure it is often possible to take measures for the prevention of the spread of disease and thereby unnecessary suffering and sometimes death.

CARE AND TREATMENT OF SCARLET FEVER

WHILE it is true that for many years serums for the treatment of scarlet fever have been used, especially in Russia and Germany and to a certain extent in this country, apparently at times with good results, until the exact cause of the disease had been established it was not possible to prepare serums which were truly specific against the disease. Furthermore, they had to be given in huge doses, and disagreeable and sometimes serious effects of crude horse serum followed their use. They were all prepared on the theory that they would kill or prohibit the growth of the scarlet-fever organism within the body. We now know that the symptoms of the disease are caused not directly by the organisms themselves but by the poison which they elaborate, and that by combating these poisons by anti-poison or by antitoxins the symptoms will promptly disappear.

After the so-called streptococcus serum had been practically abandoned as a remedy, the use of whole blood and serum from convalescent scarlet-fever patients was employed to a certain extent and with a good deal of success, but the difficulty of securing it and especially of keeping a stock of it on hand prevented its general use. With the discovery of Dick and Dochez leading to the manufacture of scarlet-fever antitoxin the use of convalescent blood serum, which has been shown to be far less potent than the former, will certainly be abandoned, except in instances where antitoxin is not obtainable.

It is almost impossible to be too enthusiastic regarding the effects of scarlet-fever antitoxin on the symptoms of the disease. If the child is seen within forty-eight hours from the onset and given a comparatively small dose of scarlet-fever antitoxin directly into the veins, within twelve to twenty-four hours the temperature may be expected to reach almost a normal point, the rash to disappear or be hardly recognizable, the pulse rate to fall quite as rapidly as the temperature, the inflammatory symptoms in the throat to be markedly ameliorated, and the patient to feel practically well.

When for one reason or another the antitoxin can not be given in the veins and is injected into the muscles, the results are somewhat less striking and more slowly brought about, but nevertheless extremely satisfactory. On the other hand, if patients are not seen until the third or fourth day or longer the poison of scarlet fever may have produced such decided damage to the lymphatic glands and other organs that the antitoxin has decidedly less effect, so that an early diagnosis of this disease is all important in order to obtain the full benefit of this specific treatment.

Because this remedy has not been generally available the list of cases treated is a comparatively small one; but it may be said even at this time that no case of severe or moderately severe scarlet fever when seen within the first four days should be deprived of the benefit of this treatment.

MORAL LAXITY OR MORAL LAW?

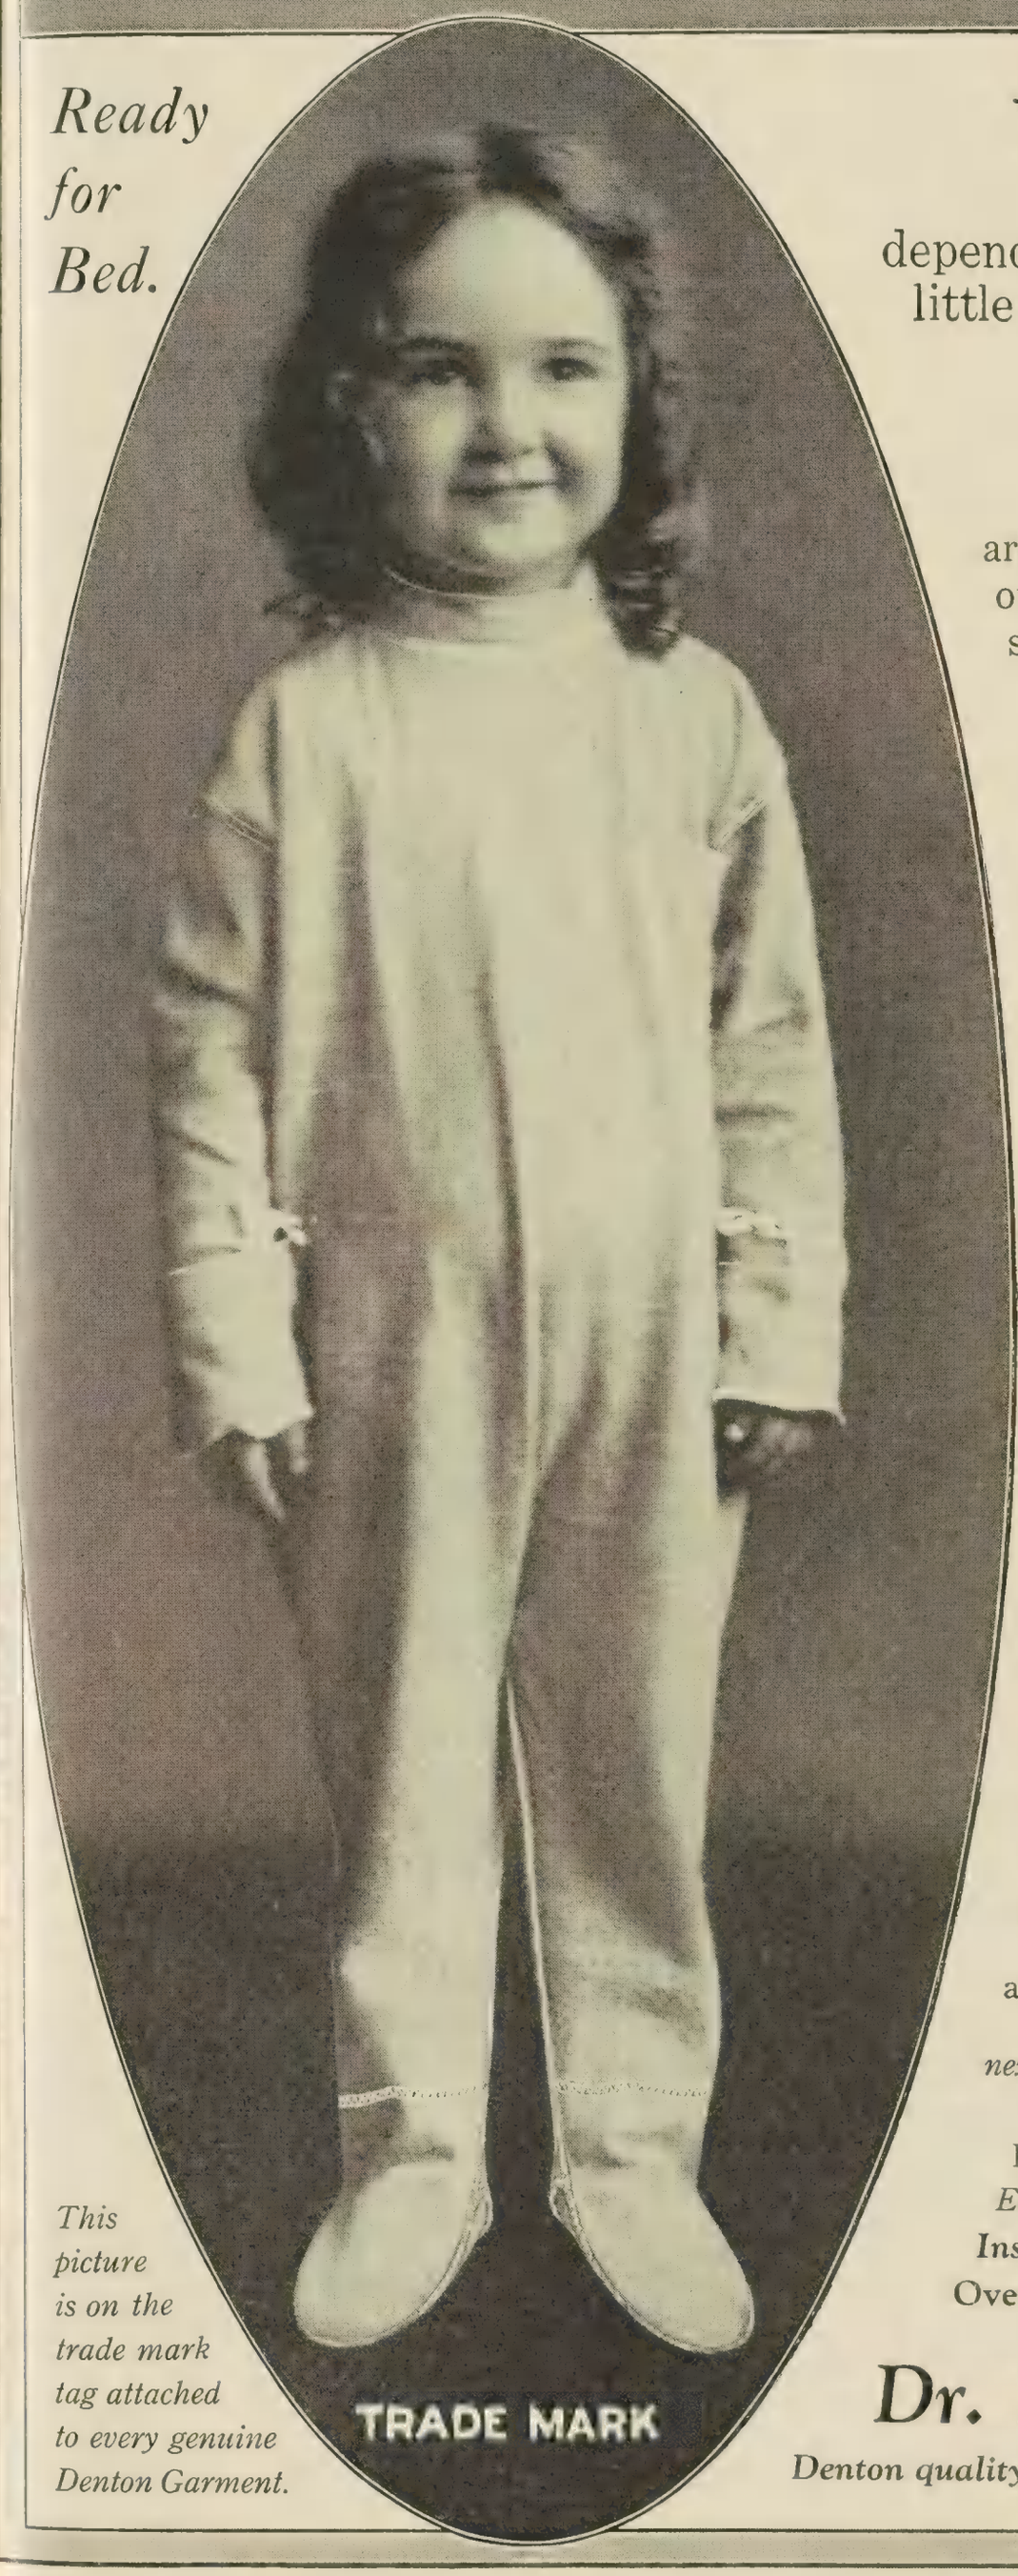
which we never can be free—the laws of living. Freedom of thought is not freedom from the laws of thinking. Freedom of life is not freedom from the laws of living.



When one starts from that angle and inquires what the law of a great life is, one comes to no feeble formula like letting oneself go. The law of great living is rather to find our loyalty, to discover the cause in which we sacrificially believe, the ideals to which at our best we rightfully belong, and to find liberty and joy in serving them. The law of high living is to give ourselves to the best we know. Psychology and morals are at one here: the basis of a worthy life is the very opposite of loose self-expression; it is devotion.

It was here that our forebears, with all the rigors and deprivations of that first Thanksgiving Day, had the better of some of us. They had found their loyalty. They had discovered their cause. They believed in something enough to suffer for it. They were not straggling through life with a futile sense of indirection. We need not pity them. They were having a glorious time.

Many moderns seem to think that only two things can be done with life: either suppress it or else loosely let it go. Upon the contrary, real life always comes from another method altogether. Give yourself to the highest that you know, and you will have all the thrill of letting yourself go in serviceable adventure, while at the same time you will have the cleanness, the self-respect, the unburdened conscience, the untarnished memory of a controlled life. At any rate, not until this generation quits its straggling, recognizes the existence of law in the interior as in the exterior world, sets itself to learn the laws and fulfil the conditions, will this generation, with all its cleverness, find value in living for itself or make a worth-while contribution to the world's history.

AN ELIZABETH ARDEN TREATMENT Photographed in Paris by Baron DeMeyer

An ELIZABETH ARDEN Treatment is based on three fundamental steps:

CLEANSING · TONING · NOURISHING

These same three steps should be a part of your daily care of the skin at home, for they supply every need of your skin to keep it clear and firm and smooth.

THE only really effective method of skin treatment—so Elizabeth Arden has found in her years of study and experience—is that which aids and stimulates the natural activities of the tissues. No cream can transform the skin. No cosmetics successfully conceal its blemishes. But scientific care, which helps to keep the skin healthy, will keep it fresh and lovely, too.

Each step of the Elizabeth Arden Treatment is fundamentally sound and effective, because it answers a definite need of the skin. The Cleansing—with pure soft Venetian Cleansing Cream—dissolves and dislodges all the dust and impurities which clog the pores. The Toning—with Ardena Skin Tonic and Special Astringent—awakens brisk circulation through the skin, closes the pores, and lifts and firms the contours. The Nourishing—with Venetian Orange Skin Food or the delicate Velva Cream—keeps every skin cell full and firm, and so prevents or corrects the wrinkles and lines of impoverishment.

A single Treatment at the Elizabeth Arden Salon will tone and refresh your skin wonderfully. But if you are too far away to make this possible, you can follow the same method in your care of the skin at home. Elizabeth Arden will be happy to answer your inquiry on the correct use of her Preparations or the use of her method to correct your individual skin faults. Elizabeth Arden recommends these Preparations for your Self Treatments each morning and night:

Venetian Cleansing Cream. Dissolves and dislodges all impurities in the pores, leaves the skin soft and receptive. $1, $2, $3, $6.

Venetian Ardena Skin Tonic. Tones, firms and whitens the skin. Use with and after Cleansing Cream. 85c, $2, $3.75, $4.75.

Venetian Orange Skin Food. Keeps the skin full and firm, rounds out wrinkles and lines. $1, $1.75, $2.75, $4.25.

Venetian Velva Cream. A delicate skin food for sensitive skins; nourishes without fattening. $1, $2, $3, $6.

Venetian Muscle Oil. A rich penetrating oil, restores sunken tissues or flabby muscles. $1, $2.50, $4.

Venetian Special Astringent. Lifts and firms the tissues, tightens the skin. $2.25, $4.

Venetian Pore Cream. Closes open pores, corrects their inactivity, refines the coarsest skin. $1, $2.50.

Venetian Amoretta Cream. An exquisite protective cream, gives a soft, smooth, natural bloom to the skin. An excellent powder foundation. $1, $2.

Poudre d'Illusion. Exquisite powder, fine, pure. Illusion (a peach blend), Rachel, Ocre, White, and a new shade called Minerva, $3.

of a good variety. A supply of lettuce to last several days may be kept fresh and crisp if when it arrives it is separated, washed well, shaken to remove surplus water and put in a loosely covered crock in a cool place.

In buying canned vegetables, one must decide which size of can is best suited to the size of the household. The Number 1 cans, which contain about one pint of material, though costing more in proportion to contents, are often more economical for two.

The same general considerations that hold for buying vegetables apply also to buying fruits. In general a serving of canned fruit should be at least half a cup. The same rule holds true for fresh fruits such as berries and those fruits which are cut in sections or pieces for serving. Cantaloups and grapefruit are well adapted to the household of two, since each makes just two servings.

When buying fruit it is helpful to remember that three or four apples, or three bananas, and three or four peaches make a pound.

As a general rule half a pound of meat or fish will adequately serve two people. Buying the meat for a family of two seems to be a problem which disturbs many housewives. The experience of persons cooking for two indicates that in terms of satisfaction and having just the right quantity it may now and again be desirable to buy meats which are considered rather expensive.

Lamb-chops may be broiled or pan-broiled. Veal-chops may be breaded and sautéd or fried, or they as well as veal-cutlet may be baked or stewed in milk. Pork-chops may be sautéd and then baked with apples.

Sliced ham may be sautéd, or it may be seasoned and baked or covered with milk and baked, or escalloped with potatoes.

Sausage may be sautéd and served with circles of apples, sugared and sautéd in sausage fat. Calves' liver with bacon is food for the gods.

Small steaks may be broiled or pan-broiled. The first cuts of a rib of beef, cut about a quarter to half an inch thick and called minute steaks, are particularly good for two. One minute steak for each, or one for two if economy is the order of the day.

Shell-fish are well adapted to a two-some.

In making pies she will find a small pie-tin much more satisfactory for two, since the pie can then be eaten while fresh and at its best. Several pie-crusts can be made at one time, as they will keep well. The paste itself may be made in fair quantity and may be wrapped in waxed paper and kept in a cold place for a week or more.

notable demonstration: "It's a matter of helping home-makers to think for themselves," determined the committee, headed by Miss Pearl Chase. This was strikingly accomplished in the Santa Barbara demonstration, in which five homes, three furnished and two unfurnished, were opened to eager home-seekers. Careful charts were displayed, showing the exact cost of every item of each of these houses, inside and out. Monthly and yearly budgets, based upon varying incomes in Santa Barbara, completed an impressive object-lesson. Both of these first-prize demonstrations are to be described in detail in a later article.

Did some one say challenge? That's a word that really ought to be saved for the special prize demonstration held by the boys and girls of Miss Elizabeth Carlisle's civics class in the Washington Junior High School of Port Huron, Michigan. With "Better home-makers for better homes" as their slogan, these youngsters planned and supervised the erection of a permanent school practice house. What they did in their campaign, just how they proved that a home of comfort and convenience, utility and beauty can be built for less than $5,000, will be told more fully later.

Not only did two communities tie for the first prize of Better Homes in America in the 1925 campaign, but four others presented such equal excellencies in their demonstrations that choice among them was simply impossible. Birmingham, Alabama; New Rochelle, New York; Greenville, South Carolina; and Cleburne, Texas; join hands, stand forward, please!

One of the palms carried off by Birmingham was the fact that its demonstration home, a gray-painted, green-shuttered colonial structure, possessing the charm of dignity and of simplicity, was adjudged the best small house, architecturally, of any entered in the 1925 campaign. This house was planned and built by Mrs. W. S. Terry. Points that excited especial interest in the throngs of visitors were the dining-room furnished as a library, the breakfast-room between kitchen and dining-room, the girl's room and the boy's room—one furnished by girl scouts of the community, the other by boy scouts—and the carefully worked-out monthly budget for a family of four.

"MAN has a part in home-making, and a large one. His responsibility does not end with paying the bills." This theory was one unusual feature of the New Rochelle demonstration, with J. Albert Mahlstedt as chairman and Mrs. Charles Gregory as assistant. From the boys in the schools, who were taught that home-making is a noun belonging to the masculine as well as to the feminine gender, to the leading men of the community, who held a special meeting given over to man's part in the home, inspired by Secretary Hoover's article in THE DELINEATOR, the "stronger" sex was notably represented in the demonstration.

"The sort of home any citizen can afford." This was the watchword in Greenville, South Carolina, where the Better Homes demonstration was held under the auspices of the Woman's Bureau of the Chamber of Commerce, with Miss Andrea C. Patterson as chairman. Visitors from twelve states, learning that the charming six-room home had been built at a cost of only $3,500, on a $1,200 lot, and delightfully furnished for $1,000, went away with a new gleam of hope in their eyes. Harried home-makers took new heart of grace, when they saw that a kitchen with a double drainboard, built-in broom closets and capacious cupboards, and a living-room attractively designed and tastefully furnished need no longer dance ahead of them as mere will-of-the-wisps through the years. The Greenville demonstration attained its especial distinction because it simultaneously touched the rock-bottom of cost and the top-notch of worth.

Cleburne, Texas, the fourth in this quartet of prize-winners, with its Better Homes demonstrations sponsored by the home economics department of the University of Texas and the women of the Magazine Research Club, under Mrs. F. R. Pettengell as chairman, took its high rank because of the unusual convenience and beauty and general livableness of its demonstration home, as well are ready for you here in Butterick's newest patterns!

The Very Styles Paris Is Choosing Now

PARIS is in a new mood this Winter! "We will carry the freedom, the grace, the movement of Summer on into Winter," the couturiers said. And somehow, they did it!

First came the new woolens, soft and light as Summer chiffons—well, almost!

Anyway, light enough to permit the spoiled Parisienne to carry on into the Winter her new taste for swirling skirts—gathers, circular flares, soft full sleeves—what not!

Then as the manikins slipped by, so graceful in the new freer kind of Winter frock—the whole matter was immutably settled.

AND as the very change took place before their watchful eyes, the Butterick experts from Butterick's Paris Headquarters on the Avenue de l'Opéra flashed the news to New York.

News of fabric. News of color. News of trimming. News of line.

The moment it is whispered there, it is heard again in Butterick's, New York; as instantly, the fashioning of the newest patterns is begun.

By the time the new vogue has reached America, the crisp new Butterick Patterns are awaiting you with every single why and wherefore, most especially every how, explicitly set down to help you make your own Paris gown.

PARIS SAYS:

The waistline "tie" in front is smart

Scallops vary the hem

Laces are the vogue for evening

The cape back persists and shares honors with the plain straight back

The V neck is good and so is the little upstanding collar

Tells you just how a French dressmaker does it

For Butterick's is not content merely to cut your gown for you, it gives you a unique pattern service—the Deltor. Step by step, in illustration and the printed word, the Deltor gives every detail of the making. The simplest things a beginner wants to know. The newest finishing touches the French houses use.

And when the last stitch is sewed, the swirling flounce or pert bow takes its place just as Paris planned, you can hardly believe you did it yourself!

Every Butterick Pattern has the Deltor folded in with it. Make your next dress by it. Know what a comfort it is to have such complete, such expert advice! Butterick of New York, Paris and London.

The Butterick Pattern with the Deltor is the only pattern which gives you

1. Layout for cutting your size and your view out of your width of material.
2. Complete finishing instructions for the very trimmings shown in the illustrations.
3. The smart fabrics and colors Paris is using for the particular mode.

as the general community value of its whole campaign for home betterment. A model kitchen contest revolutionized a large number of old-fashioned back-breaking kitchens of the neighborhood. All the houses in the neighborhood of the demonstration home were repainted during the course of the campaign. A number of others were remodeled. The better home is being reproduced to the last detail by at least two other citizens.

THERE is no gladder or more gallant page in the history of the 1925 campaign than the one written into the record by rural communities. Roanoke Rapids, North Carolina, was chosen as the first prize-winner of the rural division; Gaithersburg, Maryland, as second, and Bergenfield, New Jersey, as the third.

How great an achievement of the home-betterment campaign was in Roanoke Rapids, which includes Rosemary, with Mrs. F. M. Brown, as chairman, and Miss Bernice Allen, the county home demonstration agent, as assistant, can be realized only when it is understood that Roanoke Rapids is a community without a leisure class.

There was a Better Homes garden contest, with one hundred and fifty contestants, in which one old seventy-six-year-old homemaker got so excited at the thought of actually owning a flower garden at last that she did not wait for her men-folk to return from the mill, but went out and cut down a dead tree, in order to begin work on her garden. There was a model kitchen contest, with one hundred and fourteen entrants, in which the first prize was won by a woman who, for the expenditure of six dollars, and who knows how much loving effort, turned a kitchen that had been no less than an affliction into a household blessing with freshly painted walls, a sink, a new cupboard, a kitchen table raised to the proper height, a wood-box on rollers, and dainty sash curtains. There was a school contest, in which the pupils as a whole not only wrote Better Homes essays and drew Better Homes posters, but cleaned yards, filled up holes where water had stood, made new walks, washed windows and planted gardens; and besides all this a five-room demonstration home that lived up to home-betterment ideas, yet made the strong appeal of having cost only $4,000 to build and $1,311.50 to furnish, was viewed by one thousand and twenty-one visitors out of a population of seven thousand.

Gaithersburg, Maryland, excelled even that record of attendance, for its pretty six-room demonstration home had eight hundred and fifty-one visitors out of a total population of eight hundred, proving that its charm drew some callers back again. The demonstrations held under the auspices of the Woman's Club of Gaithersburg with Mrs. G. A. Chadwick as chairman not only demanded and got the interest of the entire community, but secured the cooperation of all the neighboring towns.

But the best of it is that, like John Brown's soul, the Better Homes demonstration in Gaithersburg still goes marching on. It is to be an all-the-year-round affair, with the committee in permanent readiness to be of aid to any ambitious home-maker.

Bergenfield, New Jersey, is a typical melting-pot farm community, so that perhaps a dozen foreign accents were heard among the visitors to the demonstration home—four thousand three hundred of them in a community of nine thousand. But, however many accents, there was just one intonation, which clearly meant, "A better home for us, too." For the Bergenfield home, alluring in appearance inside and out, complete in every detail, even to cedar-lined closets, a clothes chute and a telephone closet, was so moderate in cost that it convinced its wistful visitors that a satisfying home is the outgrowth of forethought and care, rather than of undue expenditure. Much of its furniture had been made in the manual training and domestic arts department of the grade and high schools of the community.

IT WAS decided to make two honorable mention lists, the first to include only communities which had demonstration homes of unusually good architecture or skilful furnishing, open to the public throughout the entire week; which had a wide range of lectures of unusual merit; which had the cooperation of a large number of local agencies, and which reached a considerable portion of the population of their community.

Stockton, California, with Mrs. C. S. Sargent as chairman, demonstrated among the five better homes which it opened to the public a school practice house, well planned, and adequately built by twenty students in the junior department of the high school, furnished with economy and taste, and sold, before Better Homes Week was over, for $300 more than its total cost.

Sacramento, California, under the leadership of D. G. Nunneley, demonstrated nine better homes of types and cost so varied as to appeal to every citizen.

Orlando, in Orange County, Florida, with Mrs. J. T. Fuller as chairman, achieved honorable mention on three distinct counts, its general beautification program, the high worth of its demonstration home for a white family, and the manner in which its $1,600 better home for a negro family has aroused the entire colored population to the fact that an attractive home can be owned on the same terms as rent for an unattractive one. West Palm Beach, with Miss Jean Thurston, the girl scout director, as chairman, takes its high place because of its rejuvenated better home for a negro family, which at a total cost of only three hundred and fifty dollars for house, paint and furnishings, offered a shining example to every colored citizen. Fort Lauderdale, Florida, under the leadership of Mrs. A. J. Beck, won its honorable mention for the remarkable comprehensiveness of its campaign.

AMES, Iowa, offers one more convincing proof that the younger generation, once its interest and attention are turned to home improvement, brings to the task a vigor and a zest that spell success. Under the chairmanship of Miss Anna Henderson of the State Agricultural College, the furnishing and equipment of the borrowed Better Home in Ames was planned and carried out by classes in interior decoration in the applied art department of home economics, Iowa State College.

They do comprehensive things on a comprehensive scale in Mississippi. That's why the Better Homes demonstration at Columbus, with Mrs. James W. Liscomb and Mrs. William Baldwin as chairmen, won honorable mention, since it comprised a clean-up week, put on by the Women's Club; kitchen and bedroom contests, under the supervision of Miss Douglass, the county home demonstration agent; a vigorous home betterment campaign in the schools, and the exhibition of a Better Home loaned by a prospective bride and groom, furnished by the merchants of Columbus, and wired with electricity without cost by the city. And Bay St. Louis equaled this record. Its Better Homes demonstration, too, had two chairmen, Mrs. Carl Marshall, president of the Woman's Study Club, and Miss Mayme J. O'Don, home demonstration agent.

Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania, with Herbert Atkins as chairman, repeated its last year's record. The city was divided into fourteen districts for home improvement, a contest of best-kept gardens and lawns was held, two demonstration homes of moderate cost were opened, and the Welfare Federation of Wilkes-Barre turned a worthless shack in the poorest locality of Wilkes-Barre into a livable home. Quakertown, Pennsylvania, held an equally successful demonstration along very different lines with Mrs. W. K. Clymer as chairman, turning over the entire furnishing and budgeting of the demonstration home—a new school practice house—to the girls of the high school.

Noteworthy charm and general worth in the two demonstration homes in Salt Lake City, Utah, under the chairmanship of Mrs. Bartlett Wicks, won the demonstration honorable mention. Community interest was left in no doubt by the presence of twelve thousand nine hundred visitors.

The Ensley demonstration, in Alabama, with Miss Dorothy Crim as chairman, took Hands

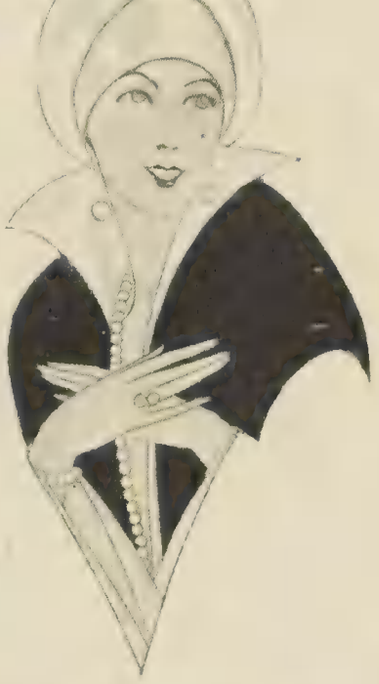
THEY PAY TRIBUTE TO

THE world has long paid homage to beautiful hands. Poets have sung of their pink-tipped loveliness, their cool aristocratic shapeliness.

Today the world pays this tribute also to capable everyday hands that engage themselves with a thousand things, yet keep their enchanting loveliness of jewel-like nails.



Everywhere women have learned to give their own hands the exquisite care that keeps them beautiful. Not only in America, but in the aristocratic capitals of Europe, they depend upon the Cutex method and Cutex manicure preparations are more widely used than any other kind.

Try this method favored by the smart women of two continents. First wash your hands in warm, soapy water. File the nails, then smooth with an emery board. Dip the orange stick in Cutex. Twist a bit of cotton around the end and dip in the bottle again. Gently loosen the dead, dry skin that clings to the nail base. Pass the wet stick under the nail tips to clean and bleach them. What smooth firm ovals of skin now frame the nails. What clean transparent tips.

A TINY bit of Nail White smoothed under each nail tip. A light buffing with the delicate powder polish. A careful washing to remove particles of powder and paste--and you are ready for the final touch of grooming!

Now, spread a drop of Cutex Liquid Polish smoothly over each nail. You will be proud to show your hands!

Keep These Little Feet Perfect

THESE scampering little feet will continue on their happy, carefree way—developing normally and correctly—if Simplex Flexies guard them in their formative years.

For Flexies, with all their smartness, are shaped and built in Nature's way—assuring perfect ankle and instep fit. Not a wrinkle, rough seam or nail-end to mar their inside smoothness. Though the famous Flexies sole is so pliable you can bend it backward with the fingers, yet right design lets the foot rest squarely on the ground. No rocking sidewise to bow the pliant little legs in or out.

Flexies were created by baby foot specialists and are recommended by many physicians because they permit Baby's foot to develop as the Creator intended. Ask your dealer about these dainty, long-wearing little shoes and write for Flexies Twin Books.

BIG LESSONS FROM LITTLE HOUSES

its high rank especially because of the kitchen in its demonstration home, which approached perfection with its cross ventilation, two windows over the double-drain-board sink, ample cupboard and shelf space, and its easy chair for the mother of the family, who, in such circumstances, would have leisure to enjoy it. The Lauderdale County demonstration, under the leadership of Mrs. R. M. Jones, won distinction with the worth of its six-room demonstration home, built at a cost of only $2,600, and the unusual beauty of the planting of its grounds. As for the Selma demonstration, in which Mrs. J. E. Tate led the community effort toward better homes, it won out because of its general scope, broad enough to include a garden contest, a house and lot contest, a better baby contest, and a guessing contest for housekeepers on the cost of the furnishings of each room.

Mt. Vernon, Arkansas, and Danville, Kentucky, taught a valuable lesson to their respective communities when they proved that homes, remodeled at a very moderate cost, can possess all the Better Homes requirements of comfort, convenience and beauty. Mt. Vernon, a village with two hundred and fifty inhabitants, led all attendance records with the one thousand one hundred and ten visitors at its demonstration, which was put on by the Woman's Home Demonstration Club, with Miss Jennie Nolen as chairman. The Danville demonstration home, with Mrs. Allen Hieatt as chairman, won the wondering favor of the public from the fact that $1,000 covered the total cost of the three-room house, exclusive of the lot, and furnishings.

The Washington, D. C., campaign, under the leadership of Miss Edith G. Salisbury, possessed many features of unusual excellence, as, indeed, was only fitting in a demonstration fortunate enough to be within hailing distance of Dr. James Ford, the executive director of Better Homes in America, and to have his administrative assistant, Miss Julia D. Connor, upon its committee. The special feature of the Better Home in Aurora Hills which won it honorable mention was the exact budgeting of every item of its well-planned furnishing, with the careful indication of possible adjustments in price.

A community project in the truest sense was the Better Home demonstration at Bel Air, Maryland, where the campaign was held under the auspices of rural women as a county project, Miss Mary Risteau serving as chairman for Harford County, and Mrs. J. Ford Dorrence for Bel Air. Special features of the demonstration were the labor-saving equipment of its demonstration home, its girls' bedroom furnished by four home economics clubs of the county, its sick-room demonstrations, the dress-making demonstration, and the salad-and cake-making demonstration.

Last of the first honorable-mention list comes Anderson, South Carolina, where the committee, with Mrs. J. O. Saunders as chairman, built and furnished an admirable six-room home, at the cost of $5,634.53 for the house, and $1,500 for the furnishings, and auctioned it off on the closing day of Better Homes week.

THE second list of honorable mentions, which is given below, was granted to communities with or without demonstration homes on the breadth and quality of their programs:

Home's best? Yes, but the 1925 campaign for Better Homes in America proves this: There's just one thing better than a home—and that's a better home.

"Bryne," he said—straight off in that level voice of his—"Bryne, this thing between my sister-in-law and you is off. She is not going, Bryne."

Straight off like that, just as I have written it.

Bryne—a staggering jolt for him, straight into his face as he entered the room and from a man he had not seen more than twice before in his life—Bryne said—what could he say—just "Oh!"

Sim said: "My brother Charles is dead. He shot himself."

There was a paper-knife on the table beside Bryne, a big ivory thing, and Bryne put his hand down to it and took it up, and it broke in two within the pressure of his fingers—crack—and he put back the pieces on the table. "My God!" he said. Then, after long pause, again: "Did he know?"

"No, he never knew."

Sim went then to go away, and Bryne stood aside, his head bowed so that his chin was on his chest. Sim stopped. Something much more than human was about that man that day. As he went past Bryne, he stopped and he said to him: "Bryne, my brother Charles was very fond of you."

I had all this, Bryne's view of it, from Bryne himself one day when we were talking of Sim. He told me that the man's pause like that and tone in which he spoke went through him like—well, his expression to me was, "I can't tell you what it was like. All I know, B. C. D., is that when he said like that, 'Bryne, my brother Charles was very fond of you,' I stammered out, 'God help me, Sim—I know he was.'"

Sim said to him: "I believe that Alice did not realize what she was doing. Bryne, I think that in a way you did not. Anyway, your wrong to Charles isn't done. It was put away from him and put away from you and Alice too. Good-by, Bryne." And came away.

What gave that man the look he had, the tone he spoke? What made Alice cling to him hard? What made Bryne, what later made Linda, what made Andrew——

But he came to me in my rooms that same day and I myself saw the reason.

"I have hit some trouble," he said. "A heap."

"By Jove," I said, "I am sorry to hear it, Sim— But man, you don't look like it. Man, Sim," I said, "there is a look about you as if—" and I stopped, stuck fast.

There was a light in his face.

But there was much more than that.

As he stood there, I felt that for the first time in my life I was looking upon a man who was in perfect balance. I mean physical balance—and holding on his face the perfect apex of it all—a steady, ready, level light, held up in perfect equipoise.

Astounded at it, I said to him: "What has happened to you, Sim? I don't mean your trouble—I mean——"

He told me that he had found something.

"But, Sim," I said, "but what the dickens is it you have found that has put this—dash it—this wonder in your face?"

He said to me: "I have found that for which men have been looking ever since the war—good God, by which, if they had found it before, there would have been no war."

And he told me what it was—his Purpose, the thing for which he had come to believe himself selected, set aside.

I was the first he ever told it to! I!

I have in his own hand the first pages of the first draft he wrote of it. And since writing it was his first intention, and since this my record is a chronology, it is best, I think, that I should insert it a little later at the point of time when it was written.

He talked to me after that about his brother. He was terribly cut up about Charles's death. I remember a thing he said, and it is a thing I think should be preserved.

"B. C. D.," he said, "one thinks of one's dead—I think of the dead, of my mother, and bitterly repine the past—the opportunities neglected, the slights, the hurts—and wish to God I had her here to live the past with her again. What happens? Now my brother dies and I cry out to him the same tempestuous regrets. But, B. C. D., I have the chance again. Not with the dead—they are gone; but with the living. One thinks of the dead; one forgets the living—that is the dreadful error that one makes. B. C. D., we can not have the dead back nor live last year again. But we have the living and we have, for their endearment, this year and all the years that start to-day."

B. C. D. in this record of his has a deal to say here of points at which Sim's life had been touched by his brothers, by Alice and by Linda. Already related, they here may be omitted. He is writing, however, at some considerable time after the events and his note of one small occurrence relating to those events may be extracted:

Reverting [he says] to the situation at Charles's Blackheath house as Sim found it, I may add here a thing touching it which was told me long afterward by Conrad Bryne. We had got somehow on to the subject of whether interest could legally be added to an ordinary debt and Bryne, telling me that he never but once had had to settle a debt and that then he added interest to it ("compound," said he, "and yet without the passing of any coin whatever"), told me that it related very closely to that unhappy time when Sim came around to see him after poor Charles's death. There was a sum of money, a big sum, due apparently to a man called Jule. "I took on the settlement of that," Bryne told me. "I wrote to this Jule and told him to come down and see me about it and I saw him and I paid him, principal and interest."

"But how," I asked, "without passing of coin?"

"I paid him," Bryne said, "with my own hand—in stripes."

The recollection appeared to give him uncommon satisfaction.

RESUMED, where pertinent, the record made by B. C. D. continues:

He went straight on from me to see Andrew and to see Elizabeth Glade. To these he had telephoned making appointments from Blackheath. But Elizabeth, attending Miss Andiron, had the doctor meeting a specialist for a consultation at the hour he could have got to her, and Andrew, gone with Lord Staverton to some work in Essex, was not expected back at his house till an hour or so after the time Elizabeth hoped to be free to see him. This was why he had looked in on me first and why he went on from me to Elizabeth, the news of Charles's death to be broken to Andrew after that. He had already, on the telephone, told Elizabeth, and at his arrival she opened the door with the condolences she had already given him anew on her lips. But they were not the first words she spoke. Immediately she saw him she was caught up, as I had been caught up by his appearance, and her first words (she knew, of course, much more than I had known) were: "Sim, you have found your Purpose!"

He smiled at her (I can imagine that smile). "Yes, Elizabeth."

She released herself from Miss Andiron for a snatched half-hour the following day and came to see me, to talk to me about Sim. "Balanced," I told her, relating my reaction to the astonishing look of him—"a man whose every thought and cell and fiber was perfectly in his control, perfectly adjusted." And she agreed: "Yes, yes—that is better than mine," she said. "Tuned" was the word that came to me—I somehow had the feeling of an instrument that would give the perfect note whatever chord of it was touched.

She had it even better in her next words. "In tune with the Infinite," she said.

That phrase took us immediately to the thing that had given him his look—his discovery of that for which the world has been seeking ever since the war—a positive faith that will satisfy. And when we had spoken of the wonder of that, the wonderful simplicity—"What is he going to do?" I asked her. "How is he going to set about it? I mean how is he going to——"

She gave me the right term. "To carry out his Purpose," she said.

Elizabeth then told me that his idea was to return to Old Ballards and write his message, his positive faith that would satisfy, as a book and publish it. That seemed to him, she told me, the clearest way.

B. C. D.'s record may now be set aside—Sim in his direct progress taken up again.

ANDREW, out of town, had not been told on the telephone, as had Elizabeth, of Charles's tragedy. He had been told on his return to his house of the message that Sim was coming to see him, and it was of Linda only (from Sim who had been last to see her) that he was expecting to hear. Expecting it, avidly awaiting it, Andrew had neither eyes nor ears for other things.

Sim came in to him in the study and he turned swiftly round from his desk. Now!

"Niggs, old man, how goes it?" The old greeting. "Oh, pretty good, Sim." The old response. But he had not with it the old quick flashed smile.

"Sim, I have been wanting you like hell. Tell me from the beginning——"

"Old man, I have something else to tell you first. Old Charles——" He told him.

Andrew's face did not change. If it showed anything, while he listened, it showed impatience. More as one rebuffed than as one shaken he turned away when Sim had done and, with no comment, paced the room.

He stopped suddenly in his striding and swung right around upon Sim. "Sim, tell me everything about Linda."

Standing precisely where he had swung around, making no movement, giving no sign, he listened while he was told. Sim said nothing yet of Linda's financial troubles, which in the advantage of the compassion Andrew must have for her plight he had determined sympathetically to place before him. The affair with Toridd Lesson equally he had determined was never for Andrew's hearing.

To all that he heard Andrew listened without question, without comment. He had said that to learn Sim's news he had been wanting to see him "like hell" but his manner of receiving it was that of a judge receiving from counsel the statement of a case, and when it was done it was Sim and not Andrew who spoke again.

"How is she doing, Niggs? I came away to-day before I got the report. Have you had yours?"

Andrew moved then, taking from his table that day's report and handing it to Sim. It had the phrase, "but continuing on the whole to run a normal course," and Sim caught at that and expressed his relief in it. He handed back the paper. "Poor Linda—

How to get children to eat without urging

A new food from Switzerland that brings roses to their little cheeks—

And actually whets their appetites for all other foods—

See what 3 days will do
Make this simple test

LISTLESS appetite! How common it is among children. And how dangerous!

It leaves them undernourished. Keeps their nerves awake at night. Saps their strength. Leaves them an easy prey to germs of disease.

But now you can easily correct this condition. In a short time. A cup of Ovaltine at meals and at bedtime will work wonders. For children eagerly drink it—when they won't eat other foods.

Ovaltine itself gives them vital nourishment in its proper form.

But—more important still—Ovaltine will, after a few days use, actually stimulate their appetites for other foods. It will create a natural hunger at meal times.

This is why:

How this new way restores appetite —brings restful sleep at night

First—Ovaltine combines in easily digested form, certain vital food-essentials in which the daily fare of so many children is lacking. One cup of Ovaltine has more real food value than 12 cups of beef extract.

Second—Ovaltine has the power actually to digest 4 to 5 times its weight of other foods which may be in the stomach. Thus, a few minutes after drinking, it is turning itself and all other foods into rich, red blood.

In this way Ovaltine clears the digestive tract. It takes the burden from the stomach. For when children refuse to eat, it means their stomach has not rested from previous meals.

Ovaltine, by quickening digestion, makes the stomach ready sooner for the next meal. And as any doctor will tell you, an empty stomach brings on natural hunger. Thus, normal appetite returns.

Ovaltine taken at night brings children sound, restful sleep. Morning finds them fresh, clear-eyed, buoyant. Ovaltine, taken daily, keeps them in the pink of condition. A tremendous aid to normal growth.

A pure delicious food— 20,000 physicians recommend it

Children love Ovaltine. And it is good for them any time of the day. It contains no drugs or chemicals. It has been in use in Switzerland for 30 years. And is now in universal use in England and her Colonies.

American mothers are fast adopting Ovaltine for their children. Hundreds of hospitals also use it. More than 20,000 physicians in this country know and recommend it. Not only as a restorative, but also for malnutrition, convalescents, nursing mothers and the aged.

A 3-day Test

Drug stores sell Ovaltine in 4 sizes for home use. But to let you try it we will send a 3-day introductory package for 10c to cover cost of packing and mailing. Send in the coupon with 10c in stamps.

Make Every Wood Finish Look New

THAT nice appearance of freshness that you admire in newly built houses—the woodwork of your home can have it, too. To prove it, just clean one surface—a door, or the woodwork of one room—with O-Cedar Polish. Beauty you never dreamed the wood possessed will be the result. And to add to the wonder of it, the trial treatment points out to you that, in a few hours, at most, you can make every wood finish in your home look new with this harmless liquid beautifier. It makes housecleaning almost fun, it cleans and polishes so easily.

The Amazing Beauty Treatment

The advantage of O-Cedar is that it releases and removes the soil of years without injuring the finish. In fact, as a polishing agent alone, it is favored by millions of good housekeepers in every climate who have learned that the finest piano, or the most delicately finished table top, is all the better for a periodic protective application of O-Cedar Polish. It dries hard and smooth.

Today get a bottle. Pour a little O-Cedar on a soiled spot, then rub with a well moistened cloth. Off will come the soil and up will arise the original beauty of the wood. Rub then with a dry cloth for a high polish. On clean finishes, just moisten a dry cloth with O-Cedar and apply evenly after which rub dry with a fresh cloth.

Try it on your automobile. Sold everywhere with a money-back guarantee of satisfaction in five convenient sizes priced at 30c to $3. Write for valuable free leaflet of Household Hints.

ONE INCREASING PURPOSE

and Niggs, old man, poor you. This is terrible for you, Niggs."

"It is bad," Andrew said.

It was his sole contribution to the debate. He had out his car then and went down to Sussex with Sim to look upon his brother Charles, the body abandoned of its spirit.

There was an inquest, a funeral, a return, the settling by Sim of Alice's affairs, her return as a widow to her mother's house.

The churchyard of the parish in which stood the cottage of Charles's dreams lay also in a fold of the downs, and at Alice's appeal there was laid Charles. "Sim, if you had heard him talk of the fold in the downs! That is where his spirit will love to see him rest."

She put a belt of his in his coffin beside him. She brought back with her—carried in her hands, not wrapped up—a pair of new-soled, brass-spiked shoes.

"IT IS bad—" that sole pronouncement of Andrew's on the case of Linda—hung like the solemn note of a warning bell in all his further reference to her while Sim was in daily touch with him. Reports of her took first an encouraging, then, as the period of the secondary fever passed, an assured note. Days drew on toward the time, if all continued well, of her release; and Sim daily congratulated his brother. Andrew received all with the same judgelike mien that had received Sim's first account. He thought, it was perfectly clear to Sim, of nothing else but Linda—but what he thought only the reverberations of that warning, "It is bad," gave signal. Sim had misgivings, but he put them from him.

Relying on his decision that trouble for Linda might best be assuaged while compassion for her might be its counsel, he opened with Andrew the subject of her debts, representing them as the mere careless accumulation of frivolities that easily could have been settled as they arose, and encouraged by no emotion in Andrew other than the impassive attitude of all these days, proceeded to lay bare in total the figure at which they stood.

"Of course," he said, reaching this point, "it has mounted to a goodish lump, running on in that light-hearted, irresponsible way of hers. You won't mind that, Niggs?"

"I absolutely do not mind," Andrew said.

"Good old Niggs—I knew you would not. It goes up on the three-figure notch—the thousands."

"I absolutely do not mind."

"Eight."

"I absolutely do not mind." But he added this time other words. "It will be merely the closing of an account. When she returns, there will be no more of that."

Sim cried: "I am sure there won't."

Andrew said: "She will be different."

The voice was the solemn warning of that warning bell again.

"A FAITH that would satisfy."

Sim had found it—it had been revealed to him. And his Purpose, disclosed to him at last, was (he knew instinctively and with no shade of doubt) to reveal it to his fellows. This was that for which, while in the world-war millions fell, he, in the heart of it, had been spared; this was that toward which ever since the war, insensibly but surely, he had been advancing. Clearly he could see as he looked back how sure, and yet how unknown to himself, had been his preparation.

Plain as a mountain path, ascended and looked back upon, he saw the way that he had come. Clear as the prospect set before the climber who has gained at last the summit, he saw the truth to which at last he had been brought.

He was writing it.

Back at Old Ballard's, settled down to the delivery of that faith to the world, it was strange to him how, as eagerly he proceeded, constantly there would come between his knowledge and the words in which he sought to put it that warning sound of Andrew's words of Linda: "It is bad"—"She will be different."

News came from her and his troubled thoughts increased. The day of her discharge from the hospital arrived and on its morning he arose to go, though in her letter she had not invited him, to bring her away and, if she should wish, to take her up to Andrew. But he did not go. When he came downstairs there was a letter from her written from Mayfair Street, asking his forgiveness for the small trick she had played upon him. "I told you the wrong day because I knew that you would wish to come to me and after all I have been through I somehow could not bear to see you straight at the door as I came out." She said no word of how she was or felt; no word of pleasure at being home again; no word of Andrew. She ended simply with: "Do not come up just yet, Sim. I do not feel very much like seeing any one just yet. I will write to you."

She did not write.

AND now, curiously, Sim began to have the feeling that, ardently though his knowledge tingled and uplifted him, it was not in this written form that he was called to present it. He was disturbed.

Instead of writing onward, he read back, weighing what he had written, searching for the flaw. He could find no flaw. He had written out of his heart.

But the doubt grew.

He was sitting one day pondering it, his mind between it and between his troubled thoughts of Linda, when there happened that which was to be the lamp to show his doubt in actual form, the light by which he should have grace and courage to resolve it. He had not an idea when it happened that out of it clarity of that kind was to come. What happened was that, sitting before his table deep in thought, he looked up at a sound and saw Linda.

"Sim!"

"Linda!"

She wore a heavy veil—he could not see her face. But she was utterly and dreadfully different. He had known her figure, shaped like a lovely fairy, plumed like a lovely bird; he saw her now in shapeless black. He had heard her voice, piped with the pipes of laughter, tuned with the fork of glee; he heard her now in tones thin, lifeless, having a dry, metallic sound.

"Am I changed, Sim?"

She had been telling him that she was going by road (through the window he could see Andrew's big touring-car outside) to stay with a married sister down in Somerset; she could stay here for ten minutes only, else darkness would have fallen before she made her point. Now she seemed come to end of that, and he, recovering a little from his first shock and grief at what he saw, had said: "But Linda, Linda, before all this there is such heaps I want to hear. This is the first time I have seen you——"

"Am I changed, Sim?"

He tried for the old gay way between them. "Why, not in asking impossibilities, anyway. How on earth can I tell if you are changed? Veiled, muffled, you don't let me see a thing of you and then you ask me——"

She put her hands to her veil and raised it. "Look, Sim," she said—nothing more.

He could have caught his breath, but he repressed himself. But what his eyes told he could not disguise. He was shocked utterly, and he knew that she knew that he was shocked. His heart, as with sudden rush of blood, filled up and felt to burst with pity and with love for her, and he knew that she knew that his heart was filled.

"Oh, my poor Linda!" he said and opened his arms toward her.

She ran into his arms and threw her own about him, and he held her strongly, strongly to him and she sobbed and sobbed.

She was telling him presently all that within the sounding of that warning bell he had felt, all that when she removed her veil and then lay sobbing, clinging, in his arms he had known. "Andrew," was what she told him. It was the first word of her disclosure. It was the only word she need have said if he had needed confirmation of his fears. It is the only word that needs here to be written to publish all she told.

"Andrew——"

She was gone presently. Nothing would prevail on her to stay.

"It is bad—" Andrew had not meant, pityingly, that her plight was bad—it was the prospect on which he looked that he meant was bad: prospect of revulsion of those senses which had been ravished by her as she used to be. "She will be different—" he had not meant, pityingly, that by suffering her nature would be different now—it was her lovely self which, ravished, he had decked and cherished, that he meant would be different and that he dreaded now to see.

HE TURNED to his writing. He found in it in the days that followed increasing doubts. Was it in this form as he was writing it that he was called upon to present his conviction? What other way, he began to ask himself, could be? By telling it?

Involuntarily he made a strongly negative motion of his head. Not even remotely visioning it as a telling by public preaching, but solely by moving about among and telling to his friends, it was an alternative to writing from which he shrank utterly and with every fiber of his mentality. Why, so utterly he shrank from dealing outwardly with things religious that the very book when it was written he proposed to publish anonymously.

On a day of these new doubts and surmises a voice behind him broke in on him: "Is there an answer, sir?"

He knew the voice for Margaret Yeoman's. He laughed a little ruefully and said: "Why, that is just what I would like to know, Margaret. What is it, a note?" and turned toward her.

"A telegram, sir."

He took it. It was signed "Doctor in attendance." It read: "Mrs. Andrew Paris lies very gravely ill and is asking for you. Hasten."

"Hasten!" O sinister and portentous word!

Through the interminable hours of the long cross-country railway travel to where she lay, "Hasten" in regular and sonorous beat, like solemn tolling of a funeral bell, smote on his mind.

Strange how the sound as of a bell persistently had imaged in his thoughts since last he was in the train, bound then to settle down to accomplishment of his Purpose by writing it as it had come to him. "It is bad"— "She will be different." A bell-buoy swinging as in muffled warning with the tides had overhung his work with fogging doubts. "Hasten!" A church-bell tolling on the note of doom now caused it to be laid aside and took him from it. Strange? There grew upon him, as his journey crawled, the conviction that it was much more than strange—it was significant. Here in the message that he had to tell, but had not told, was that which if Linda, "gravely ill," lay dying, would have been arms about her in the valley of the shadow she must face; here, had Andrew known it, was that which would have opened in him other vision than those cold disfavored eyes which he had set upon her in the pitiable days which she had lived with him. "Hasten!" He might have told. He had shrunk from telling.

IT WAS night, after ten o'clock, when at last he came to her. He had been surprized at the signature of the telegram that had come to him. "Doctor in attendance—" curious that the married sister with whom she was had not sent the message. He found it explained when he arrived. She was not with a married sister nor with any relative. The hiding-place to which she fled was the home of an old nurse of her family's who, as he now was told by the woman, had helped bring her into the world, conducted her childhood, seen her married, now— The woman wiped her eyes. Yes, the doctor was here, had just come down, was in the sitting-room.

"I will tell you this," the doctor said. He was a very big man, clean-shaven, his hair perfectly white, but his face unlined. He held Sim's hand for some moments when he first took it and he spoke throughout as if he were a very old, much concerned friend. "I will tell you this, that when you ask me what is wrong I would tell you, if she were a normal case, that there is very little wrong. She is very far from normal."

"I know that," Sim said. "You know all that she has been through?"

"I know what her body has been through, not her mind."

Sim looked at him: "Terrible things."

The doctor nodded gravely. "It is clear—and because of them she is—" he seemed to pause for a deliberate word and then to find it—"foundering."

Sim said: "Sinking? Do you mean dying?"

The doctor put out a hand and made a slow downward motion with it. "I mean just slipping away—steadily. Except in a consumptive decline, I have never seen the like of it. She took to her bed, they tell me, directly she got here and old Mrs. King—a good body—at last called me in. She had contracted a chill—severe, yes, but to be thrown off in any normal case. She simply has been unable to throw it off. Her power of resistance is gone. She has come to the end."

"Do you tell me," Sim began, and to steady his voice had need to stop. He had a vision of her—utterly lost, nothing for which to live—that shook the words that he would utter. "Do you tell me that she is dying?"

"It was necessary to tell you to hasten."

"Mrs. King tells me my brother, her husband, is arriving by the midnight train. If she is so ill—dying——"

"It was impossible to learn from her before the address of any friends. She would send for no one."

Again, more poignantly yet, he had that vision of her, all lost, desirous only to hide away. "Does she know how ill she is?"

"It was necessary, to get the addresses, to tell her."

Sim had not removed the overcoat in which he had arrived. He took it off.

"I will go to her," he said. "Will you tell me how long you give——"

"I asked myself how long before I sent that telegram," the doctor said, "and then I added 'hasten' to it— She is at the end."

Sim went slowly to the door.

"I shall not come again to-night," the doctor said. "The telephone is by my bed and I am within ten minutes. Early to-morrow morning—" He took Sim's hand and held it.

"You had a consultation here this afternoon, Mrs. King tells me," Sim said. "If there is anything that can be done?"

"I think nothing—but hope. It is not a case for skill."

"What hope, then?"

The doctor regarded him meaningly. "You know more than I do, her husband perhaps more than you, of what her trouble has been." He made again that slow descending motion with his hand. This time he passed his other hand beneath it, checking its descent. "If it should be in your power, in your brother's power, to interpose—what shall I call it—rescue, relief, as I interpose this hand beneath my sinking hand, I would call that hope."

"I will go to her," Sim said.

She was lying in abandonment, utter, profound, retaining scarcely breath itself. A nurse stood by her looking down upon her.

Sim, noiselessly entering through the open door, went forward. The nurse, absorbed, did not hear him. He stopped and stood there. Outside this shadowed room was there a world that teemed and trafficked, warred, feasted, bartered, joyed? It could not be believed. There was; and she had known and loved and led that world and now lay here in utter weariness upon the bed, one that the noisy world had used and crushed and done with and now had flung here, very

A COLLEGE PRESIDENT READS HUTCHINSON

Miss Ellen F. Pendleton, President of Wellesley College, found time during the crowded days of Wellesley's recent celebration of its fiftieth anniversary to read in manuscript A. S. M. Hutchinson's DELINEATOR serial, "One Increasing Purpose."

She writes about it: "In 'One Increasing Purpose' Mr. Hutchinson has presented convincingly the development of character and purpose of an ex-service man. The affection of his brothers for Simon Paris, the hero, and the confidence as well as affection which he inspires in his two radically different sisters-in-law are strong elements in developing in the reader a belief in the genuineness of his purpose. His sacrifice to carry out this purpose when he is sure that it is 'of God' shows his own sincerity."

"One Increasing Purpose" is appearing in book form simultaneously with its sixth and last instalment published in this issue of THE DELINEATOR

tired. Lines came to him that B. C. D. had told him—

Strew on her roses, roses,
And never a spray of yew:
In silence her soul reposes. . . .

Her mirth the world required,
She bathed it in smiles of glee;
But her heart was tired, tired,
And now they let me be.

Could he speak? His throat felt filled.

He went forward and came within the lamplight before the nurse, the bed between them. The nurse looked up and faintly smiled.

He whispered: "Asleep?"

"I think not. She never really sleeps."

"Shall I speak to her?"

The nurse stooped down. "Some one has come to see you."

There was a sigh, scarcely to be heard.

Sim said: "Linda, I have come to see you—Sim. Here is old Sim, Linda."

Again the sigh.

Sim went on one knee. The nurse said: "Perhaps you would like to—" and made motion of going, and Sim nodded, and she said, "You have only to call," and was gone.

"Darling old girl, here is old Sim again."

Her eyelids very slowly lifted and she looked at him and wearily they fell again.

"We seem to be always meeting in some new place. We can't keep apart, can we?"

She murmured: "Little Sim boy."

He turned his head to wipe his eyes.

"Talk to me, Sim."

"I have come down to find out why it is you have popped off to bed again. I'm going to have you out and make you well again."

"I am so tired."

"Darling Linda, I know you are. I think I will not talk—just sit and play at holding hands."

"Talk to me, Sim."

He was there for what seemed to him a very long time, talking very softly in sentences beginning, "Do you remember?" that called up jolly times that they had had together. He could think of no other subject. He wanted very much to tell her that Andrew soon would come. He feared to mention Andrew, and did not. He wanted desperately to speak to her some sacred comfort—all that he might have told her when she came to see him and had not—and knew, and bitterly reproached himself, that he had left that too late, and did not.

She lay, eyes closed, responding nothing. Suddenly she opened her eyes wide.

"Sim!"

"Yes, Linda?"

"Tell me some good stuff, Sim."

"Linda—good stuff?"

Her eyes were drooping down again. "Sim, tell me some good stuff."

Good stuff! His heart was rent. It was the very phrase—airy, irreverent—that in her lovely gay and thoughtless days she would have used for what, when she repeated it, he knew at once she meant. Good stuff—he could have told it her abundantly and, lacking courage, had denied it her; and now with what perhaps should be her closing breath she sought it of him.

"Sim, tell me some good stuff."

What could he tell her now? "Darling Linda, a prayer?"

"Sim . . . Sim."

He said, "Listen, then, darling Linda:

"Abide with me; fast falls the eventide;
The darkness deepens; Lord, with me abide."

She sighed.

"Listen then, darling Linda:

"When other helpers fail and comforts flee, Help of the helpless, O abide with me."

Her murmur came: "Hand, Sim."

He took a hand of hers in both of his.

"Hold Thou Thy cross . . . "

His voice shook. He was forced to stop.

"Hand, Sim, hand."

"Darling, I am holding your hand—Sim has your hand. Listen, Linda darling:

"Hold Thou Thy cross before my closing eyes; Shine through the gloom and point me to the skies. . . . "

She sighed.

He could not go on. He tried to summon his voice and he began again, "Hold Thou Thy cross . . . " and could not, and at some sound across the room looked up and at the door saw Andrew standing there.

ANDREW put a finger to his lips, and mutely in bitter pain, in bitter grief, the brothers looked one on the other.

There were sounds then upon the stairs and in a moment the nurse came, a cup in hand, toward the bed. Andrew beckoned then to Sim and Sim got up and went to him. Across the passage a door stood open. They went in there and Andrew closed the door.

"Sim, can't you kill me?"

As one that casts away his coat to save a drowning man, Sim cast away his grief to save this brother. He was seen of Andrew then as B. C. D., as Elizabeth had seen him—balanced, a light held up in perfect equipoise upon his face; he was felt, his hands on Andrew's arms, steadying him; he was heard, "Niggs, Niggs, old man!"

"Sim, can't you kill me?"

"Niggs, old man, play the man."

"Sim, I have played the blackest hell. This is my judgment. Sim, will she die?"

"It stands with God, old man."

His brother said between his teeth: "If then God punishes—do you know how I have treated her?"

"I know a bit. Niggs, why did you not come to her while you stood there?"

"How could I dare? Sim, you say you know a bit. Before God, I never thought of death. Before God, now I see death coming to her to take her—I shall kill myself, Sim. I can not live without her."

"How long were you there, Niggs?"

"When she said, 'Tell me some good stuff.' "

He put his hands before his eyes and pressed them there. He cast them down and cried, "Sim, you told her good stuff. Sim, you can pray. For God's sake, pray, Sim."

"Niggs, I am praying."

"Sim, can prayer bring miracles? Pray for a miracle, Sim. Sim, pray—pray Christ to come into that room——"

Sim said: "Niggs, Christ will. Listen to me, Niggs, old man. Love casteth out death. Go in and cast out death with love. You ask for Christ. Niggs, Christ goes in with you when you go in. He does. Christ is in you, Niggs—Niggs, in you. Listen, the other day this happened to me. Into my soul the knowledge was given to me that Christ——"

Not as in haste, in stumbling words, he told it then; but as the first pages of his written draft unfold it, the subject of his Purpose now may stand:

THIS is the religious satisfaction that I have found, satisfaction of that hunger for a positive faith that will satisfy which is in all men everywhere to-day, and this is how, suddenly, mysteriously, and at a moment when I was not thinking of such things, it came to me.

I was walking in a wood near my cottage along a grassy drive which since the first day I happened upon it I had always called my mother's walk because it recalled exactly the place in which we walked together one very early Spring and in which she took off her gloves and felt the lovely softness of the first tiny leaves and buds as I found them for her. She and I never forgot that walk and for years after would speak of it, and when I found this place so very like it I named it at once hers, and always when I entered it had the strong feeling, the knowledge, that she was entered with me. So, on this day, it is to be granted that I was attuned to communion with sacred things, because when my mother (in spirit) is with me I know that the spiritual side of me is quick within me, lively and living, and my material side in abeyance, out of action, temporarily dead.

Well, then, I had been thinking of her, but in the moment I now come to I was not actively thinking of her—I was not consciously thinking of anything—my mind was empty—and suddenly in my mind was this extraordinary sentence, these four most strange and most incongruous words, one word and three words so entirely apart that of my own volition never possibly could I have joined them in the same breath. This was the sentence, these the words:

CHRIST THE COMMON DENOMINATOR

Are they meaningless to you? I am sure that if they had come to me normally, if they had been told me by some friend, if I had seen them written on some paper, meaningless they would have been to me. But they did not come normally, they came abnormally. They were told me by no audible voice, they were not seen by me with my eyes. My mind was empty and they suddenly were in my mind; and I suppose it was that, arriving mysteriously in me like that, there arrived with them their interpretation. For between receiving them and understanding what they meant there was no interval. Like a blow, causing me to stop and start, the sentence was into me; and with a rush, causing me, I believe, to take a staggered sideways step or two, tumultuously the meaning was streaming through me and I was overwhelmed and I had to go quickly to a grassy bank just there and sit down to receive it all, which I did with a sense of an extraordinary exhilaration.

Christ the Common Denominator—this is the interpretation—simply, that Jesus Christ, Son of Man and Son of God, is the common denominator, the common principle of every human being—that He is the element which is common to us all. The interpretation is, simply, that just as He once was on earth among men, so He ever since has been and is to-day resident among men, resident in every man—in you, in me, in all. He once, when among men, was visible to them. He is as visible to-day. Every smile, every kind action, every kind thought, seen or felt in those about us, those with whom we live, those whom we only pass and see, is, simply, the Christ who is in them appearing in them.

Christ the Common Denominator—it means that the more there is of love (which is Christ) and the more there is of affinity of spirit (which is the spirit of Christ common to us all) between two persons the greater by that unity becomes that spirit of Christ which is in them both. It means that the love (the affinity of spirit which we call love) between brother and sister, between husband and wife, between parent and child, between lover and lover, between friend and friend, is the increase, by conjunction, of that Common Denominator which is in us all—is the increase, by conjunction, of Christ who dwells in each of us.

It means much more than that. It means that Christ is in each one of us and that by looking for and calling up the Christ in our every neighbor, and by in so doing enlarging the Christ in ourself, it is in the power of each one of us to raise Christ from the dead—again. And more than that it means. Christ the Common Denominator—it means that when we all, always, look first and before anything else for the Christ in our neighbor, in our every fellow man, as now we look for (and find it) in those we love, and by looking for it thereby enlarge the Christ who is in ourself—why, it means that when we all, always, do that, such by multiplication will be the increase of Christ among mankind that the Second Coming will have happened.

"NIGGS,"—he is telling it now to his brother Andrew, in the little room near Linda's bedchamber—"Niggs, this is not the kind of thing that you and I have ever spoken of and the last thing that any man like you or I ever would. But Niggs, Niggs, old man, this is not—not what you and I would call 'preaching' that I am trying to tell you. Niggs, this is the tremendous and wonderful Purpose behind the scheme of things that I have got hold of—that by a kind of miracle, just as I have told you, has been put into my mind.

"And, Niggs, Niggs,"—his face is a cloudy red, he is stammering; between his nervous diffidence and his most urgent ardor scarcely at moments can he make his words—"And Niggs, old man, what I am telling you is that Christ is here in real and actual presence in each separate and individual one of us. In you, Niggs; Christ His living actual self in you. Niggs, get that, old man, and think the power and wonder of it, and call Him up in you and realize and have the wonder and the power. And He is in every man and woman whom you meet or see; each time you pass a fellow human being, Niggs, you are passing Christ. Niggs, get that; see Christ in every face; and out of every face with which you stop to speak call Him to arise to greet you and to love and help you, Niggs.

"Niggs,"—his words now hesitate, now

Eatmor Cranberries

With all meats—the tasty, tonic fruit!

Cranberry Sauce goes fine with all meats—hot or cold. It is the one touch needed to give balance to the ordinary diet. The best Cranberry Sauce can be made in ten minutes—and here's the recipe:

Ten-Minute Cranberry Sauce

1 pound (4 cups) cranberries, 2 cups boiling water, 1½ to 2 cups sugar (¾ to 1 pound). Boil sugar and water together for five minutes; skim; add the cranberries and boil without stirring (five minutes is usually sufficient) until all the skins are broken. Remove from the fire when the popping stops.

There's nothing handier for tempting desserts than 10-minute Cranberry Sauce. The ideal filling for pies, puddings, tarts, jelly roll and shortcake.

Cranberries are the easiest fruit to prepare. No coring, no peeling. Economical, because there is no waste.

Always cook cranberries in enameled, porcelain-lined or aluminum vessels.

THE TONIC FRUIT—Dietary authorities agree on the tonic properties of cranberries. Rich in iron, lime and carbohydrates—the vital elements that aid in restoring nerves and building up the system.

"I wish I had known about CORTO Radiators when I built my own home"— says FRED G. WOLTER, Architect

Louis Courtot had not designed Corto, the radiator classic, when Fred G. Wolter, of Minnesota, built his home.

But the wish which Mr. Wolter could not fulfill for himself is being satisfied in the homes of his clients. He writes:

"I like Corto Radiators for houses. They are beautiful; their Gothic lines give the sense of dignity of a cathedral spire. I wish I had known about Corto when I built my own house. As it is I have given my clients better jobs than I gave my own family."

Corto's beauty is only one reason why so many architects specify it. Its slender columns allow quick passage of the hot water, so that the radiator heats very quickly.

And so effective is its design that it occupies 30 per cent less floor space than other radiators.

Ask your Architect and Heating Contractor to specify Corto Radiators; meanwhile, send to the address below for the beautifully illustrated book describing their advantages in full.

No matter what the decorative scheme may be, Corto Radiators add a touch of charm, as shown in this unusual treatment designed by Miss Florence McComb, New York decorator.

rush, now tumble—"Niggs, all the old familiar Bible phrases that to so many seem meaningless just mean all this that I am trying to tell you. 'God sent His only begotten son into the world to save mankind.' Niggs, it was for the increase of the divine purpose that it was done. What else, Niggs, but that terrible and supreme event could have attracted the mind of the world to the purpose of God? It was done for the divine increasing purpose and it succeeded, Niggs. It succeeded—that is the proof of it. Christ died and the world from that day forward, nearly two thousand years to this day now, knew that God's purpose was and is, 'Christ rose again from the dead and ascended into heaven'; Niggs, it was into man, into the hearts of men—Niggs, into your heart and to mine—that He ascended. Niggs, it was the increase by that supreme advance of the great Purpose that goes advancing ever on and stands to-day with Christ Himself in every man and every woman waiting to be raised again from those dead among us, from those in whom He lives entombed just as in His sepulcher He lay entombed, just as——

"Niggs,"—and that light within his eyes dispels the cloudy redness of his face, levels his voice, commands his words—"Niggs, when I say 'just as' I mean because all to-day is just as all was then. We wish we had the chance of those to whom Christ came, but, Niggs, we have. By that increase of the purpose when He died for us, and dying came into us, He is even more among us now than before He was among us; and daily, hourly with each base thought, with each mean act, with every selfish thought, anew He suffers crucifixion at our hands. Niggs, in shocked memory live forever those who mocked the crown of thorns upon His head, who tormented His thirst, who drove the spear into His side; and hourly ourselves we mock, torture, drive the spear anew. Niggs, Christ the Common Denominator, the spirit common in us all, placed there two thousand years ago to advance the great purpose that, Niggs, goes swelling ever on until we raise Him from ourselves, the dead, and the great Purpose is at last fulfilled, His kingdom established here on earth."

HE IS finished—and, as he sees his spoken words, effects, his story here is finished. As Andrew takes his hands and says, "Sim, Sim!" and goes to Linda, his Purpose he knows then is to go out to the world as he had just gone out to Andrew—

> That to the height of his great argument
> He may assert eternal providence
> And justify the ways of God to man.

He is finished, and here upon that great resolve of his runs out his story.

Andrew who had not dared to go to Linda goes in—and strong in love which casteth out death, and strong in knowledge, Christ in himself and Christ in all, casts himself on his knees by her bed and calls "Linda!"

And she, like as the maid to whom, asleep, was called, "Arise!" in wonder murmurs to him, "Andrew!"

He cries, "My Linda, my beautiful!"

"Andrew!"

He puts an arm beneath the pillow and lifts her to him and holds her to his breast. "Stay with me, Linda—Linda, my own, my beautiful, my loveliest of all, stay with me, stay with me, ever and ever and ever, my darling dear, my lovely and beloved dear!"

"Andrew, Andrew!"

The doctor sees her in the morning and finds her sleeping, her hands in her husband's hands—he sees her in the afternoon, awake, her hands both in her husband's hand, his cheek against her own—and he comes down to Sim and has a laugh and makes again that sinking motion with one hand arrested by the other and laughs again: "Well, that's been found," he says.

Sim says, "And I have found as well—" and in a few days has left them.

He makes his plans. He will travel the country, telling his gospel as he goes. And travel how? Riding abroad on Ethelred debating ways and means, he comes upon the caravan of B. C. D. still standing where once he abandoned it. It is the very thing—and B. C. D. declares it is indeed, and has it out and it is painted and equipped, and Andrew gives a horse suited to slow and heavy work like this, and all is ready for the task for which he longs and which he—dreads.

Dreading it, shrinking in all his flesh from facing men and women in a capacity so utterly estranged from all his habitual way of life, he will start, he determines, by night. A market town, and market day, is chosen by him for his opening. He dare not travel in conspicuously by day—morning shall find him planted there.

Elizabeth comes down to speed him on—and between him and Elizabeth has happened that which, greeting him immediately on his return from Linda and his return to put his new-found resolution into being, struck at that resolution with a wound that caused him literally to stand for support against his room wall, hands to his head. Miss Andiron was dead. "Dead," wrote Elizabeth. "I now am free"

"And I am bound," he groaned within himself. "Ah, at the very moment of my knowledge of what I am to do, for this to come at me!"

She was telling him, as on the night of his departure she walked with him beside the horse to the foot of the hill where it was arranged she should leave him, that which when first he went to her she had told him.

"Sim, once again it is just the choice—what we would do, what we know we should do—what self desires, what selflessness demands. Sim, there is only one thing in life that does not matter, and that is self—only one real freedom in life, and that is freedom from self—only one real happiness, the happiness that comes from others' happiness. Twice we have proved it. Now comes the third and best time, Sim."

He had questioned, "The best?"

She was telling him now again why best. "Sim, just a year. Before when there stood between us what we knew was right, it seemed for all time, never to end. Only a year now, Sim. Go, unfettered, with no thoughts except thought of your Purpose, just for one year. You will know then what you have done and you will see then how best to go on doing it; if in the same way and alone—why, happy you will be it was the way you chose; if, with so much then done and learned, all that remains can more easily be done with me to help, why, then——"

He has held her in his arms: "Elizabeth, Elizabeth!"—"Sim, Sim!"

He is climbing the hill, the tail-lamp of the caravan receding steadily, steadily from her as she watches it.

She gives it all her eyes, as all her heart, and sees it fade, fade fade, from smallest point of light to point that now she thinks while she draws breath again must go. Not to be witness of that point of sudden vanishing she closes her eyes—then in a little while opens them again. It has not gone. It hangs above the hilltop, sole point of light upon a dark and starless night. "Sim!" she breathes to it. Then, as unchanging it hangs there and seems to give a light beyond itself, she knows and understands.

It is a star come out.

POSTSCRIPT

ON A DAY of a time a little later Miss Marr, regarding Lardy Quinnet, was caused by what she saw to have a little tinge of color come into her pale cheeks. In a voice very unusual to her, soft, warmly pleased: "Lardy," she said, "Lardy, you are wearing one of Sim Paris's ribbons."

"I am," said Lardy, "and shall. I went to hear him last night. He'd got his caravan on Clapham Common. The Man with the Lamp they call him—and talk about crowds! There must have been hundreds who couldn't have got near enough to hear. I heard. And when he came at the end to handing out those ribbons I took one and stuffed it in right there. You know what it means—it means just 'I went to the church with my mother as a kid—I shall be buried by the church—in between I am dashed if I scoff at the church. I may not be this, that or the other, but I am dashed if I am ashamed to own up to the faith I was born in and look to die in. This shows I'm not ashamed of doing that.'

"Well," continued Lardy, "I am dashed if I am ashamed Wherefore—" and he waved his fingers at his ribbon.

BRICK

for only $55

more than for this

HERE is practical proof that the first cost of a brick home is no more than for any kind of construction.

Two 6-room bungalows are here shown. They are exactly alike in plan and size. They were built in Corinth, Miss.

The upper one is brick throughout, except for the concrete porch floor.

In the other, brick is used only for the chimney and porch.

The all-brick home, with 8-in. solid walls, cost only $55 more to build. It will last for hundreds of years without painting or repairing. It will always command a good price.

You will find, at any of the addresses below, experienced men who will gladly help you build with brick at a cost within your reach. And they'll help you find an experienced, reliable contractor. Call on them—or mail the coupon.

Giving Variety to the Orange

NO FRUIT offers more in health and enjoyment than the orange. But even the healthful qualities of this and all other fruits (fresh or canned) are increased when combined in a variety of ways with Knox Sparkling Gelatine, a pure product without fruit extracts or artificial coloring.

Orange Charlotte
(6 Servings)

A surprising recipe from the land of the Orange Groves.

½ envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine — Salt
¼ cup cold water — 2 tablespoonfuls lemon juice
½ cup boiling water — Whites of three eggs
1 cup orange juice and pulp — 1 cup sugar
Lady fingers or stale cake

Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes and dissolve in boiling water. Add sugar, and when dissolved add lemon juice. Strain, cool slightly and add orange juice and pulp. When mixture begins to stiffen, beat, using a wire whisk, until light; then add salt, whites of eggs, beaten until stiff, and beat thoroughly. Turn into mold lined with lady fingers. One pint whipped cream may be used in place of whites of eggs.

asked Lady Delaware. "He hath told me that all was made clear in that."

"Yes, yes! I have read it. He tells me of his most precious life having been saved by this Pocahontas and, with much verbiage, explained that she beguiled her kingly father to feed our poor settlers in Jamestown rather than to kill them. But doth that mean I must kiss the hand of this aborigine?"

Lady Delaware smiled. "Pocahontas's father, King Powhatan, bade her see the queen and king of our great land that he might judge by their treatment of his daughter how they wished him to treat the English in the Jamestown settlement."

"Ah!" the queen nodded thoughtfully. "Methinks I understand now what the pother is about! And Captain Smith! Why hath he come and not the consort, Rolfe?"

"Master Rolfe is ill of a fever, your Majesty. Captain Smith, who hath a fatherly interest in the princess, volunteered his services."

"Get to the point, my Lady Delaware!" ejaculated the queen.

Lady Delaware shook her head. "I know not the point. I know that he wishes, above all things, to plant colonies on that shore north of the Virginia lands, which he hath called New England, and which he saith the Spanish will also have before another year is out. I know that he hath run through his own small fortune in his endeavor to save the north coast of the New World for your Majesties. But what he hopes to gain by this visit I know not."

"Let them be brought hither," said Queen Anne, "and let Buckingham cease dancing attendance on that pretty wench in blue and come hither while I bespeak him concerning a matter."

THE young Duke of Buckingham (whose extraordinary beauty as mere George Villiers had made him first the king's favorite, then the king's adviser) dropped to one knee and kissed the queen's hand. She looked at him with an expression at once fond and quizzical.

"My good dog, Buckingham," she said, "wilt have an eye as usual to his Majesty's manners at the levee to-morrow?"

"As always, your Majesty," replied the duke, with a smile that showed his fine teeth. "'Tis well the Prince of Wales hath taken his manners from his royal mother."

The quizzical look in the queen's brown eyes deepened as she smiled at this handsome man. "Dost need to flatter me, good George? I am thy true friend, without fawning." Then with sudden hardening of her voice, "This Argonaut from Spain—is he, to-night, attending on the king?"

"Yes, your Majesty, he sits beside the royal bed, not unedified, methinks, when his Majesty speaks."

"'Tis likely; but all his interest, ne'ertheless, is in my baby Charles. Buckingham, Charles is but sixteen! I will not have him bound to the Infanta Maria. He shall marry a blue-eyed, yellow-haired, English-speaking maid who will help him to understand his England as the good James doth not."

"Methinks his Majesty hath gone too far in this matter," said the duke. "He hath asked Spain to sanction the betrothal."

The queen's face, peculiarly mobile in speaking, turned to stone. She stared at James's favorite with eyes in which burned bitter anger. "That shall not be!" she exclaimed in a low voice. "Rather had I see Charles wedded to a blackamoor, or to that Indian princess coming yonder through the doors."

Buckingham followed the queen's gaze. Pocahontas stood in the distant door of the great banqueting room, Captain Smith and Lady Delaware behind her. The Virginian stared with interest at the gay scene. The three huge crosses on the ceiling, the Christmas greens and the wassail bowls marked the Twelfth-night season. The brilliant costumes, the music of hautboy and viol, the laughter, the twinkle of a thousand unshaded candles, the dancing, confused the Virginian, many as were the festivities she had attended in England. For a moment she wondered which of the dancers might be the queen. Then her sweeping gaze fell upon the velvet-hung dais at the distant end of the room.

Pocahontas drew a deep breath. She had been told many times that Queen Anne hated injustice. Surely, Pocahontas told herself for the twentieth time that day, the queen would listen to her appeal.

"Way for the Princess Pocahontas! Way!"

The dancing suddenly ceased and down a lane of bowing folk in satins, velvets, jewels that blazed like forest fires, the Virginian approached the dais and kissed the hand of England's queen.

"Nay! They tell me thou art of royal blood!" smiled Anne, scanning the young princess's tragic face with softening eyes. "Must not kneel to me. Stand here beside me and let us hear together the petition of the adventurer who towers behind thee."

She extended her hand to John, who knelt and pressed his lips upon it.

"I have read your letter, Captain Smith," the queen went on. "Is your tongue perchance as long as your pen?"

"Had I done justice to my subject, your Majesty," replied John, with a smiling glance at Pocahontas, "my letter had been as long and as pretty as one of Ben Jonson's plays."

The queen laughed and turned to Pocahontas. "The king, your royal father, rules what nations, princess?"

"Powhatan rules over seven great tribes of the Algonquin peoples, your Majesty," replied Pocahontas, "who are scattered over a territory methinks must be wider in extent than your gracious land of England."

"Indeed! I knew not that!" ejaculated the queen. "He lives in royal state, then, as becomes his great station."

"He hath great power," replied Pocahontas simply, "but not great state. His people are without the arts of the whites. And yet, they hold him in great awe. He dwells in a wide forest, beside rushing waters, with pleasant sights and smells and sounds forever in his senses. Yet his rule is the rule of blood. I like it not."

"You like it not!" cried the queen, her attention called at once, as Lady Delaware had guessed it would be.

Pocahontas smiled. "I was to learn, while young and soft, of better ways. When I was twelve and Captain Smith was brought prisoner to our court, methought he must be a visitor from another world, a better world. And when, after many days, I clasped his head in my arms to save him from Powhatan's executioners, I told myself, child though I was, that always would I stand between him and his people and my father."

"A noble resolve! Why didst make it, Princess Pocahontas?" pursued the queen.

"Because I loved him," answered the Virginian with her wistful smile.

"As a daughter should love her father, your Majesty," interrupted the captain hastily.

"You speak needlessly, my good adventurer," said the queen impatiently. "Must you apologize for a thing as sweetly refreshing as this?"

Smith bowed his head and the queen returned to Pocahontas. The dancing had begun again, but to the absorbed group on the dais its sounds were vague as though in the forests of Virginia they heard the crash of distant waters.

"And so," said the queen at last, "you married one of Captain Smith's people. Mayhap 'twas to save that little colony from thy father's bloody rule?"

"Mayhap it was, your Majesty," agreed Pocahontas. "Thus I held the little town safe for him after they told me he was dead. And I thought, in heaven he will see how Pocahontas hath kept her vow."

JOHN moved uneasily. The queen gave him an impatient glance. "Though 'tis an old tale to you, good captain, 'tis new to us. Hold! Why should you not present your petition now, then leave the princess to talk alone with me?"

"I had heard, your Majesty," said John obediently, "that it was owing to your kindness that Sir Walter Raleigh was last year released from the Tower and set to fitting a vessel to seek gold on the Orinoco. I have not been in the Tower, most gracious queen, nor do I know where to find gold for the privy purse. It is not gold which England needs. Pirate ships will not bring back the glory of Elizabeth's reign to these ribald days."

Queen Anne's brows were all but touching the jeweled pendant on her forehead. "You speak boldly, sirrah, and"—somewhat contemptuously—"I like it little."

John Smith's straight gaze into the queen's cold eyes did not waver. "I crave your pardon, most gracious queen," he said.

Anne suddenly smiled. "Say on, good captain, and say truth."

Smith squared his broad shoulders. "Our much-loved country is, after all, a tiny island and must hold its own against nations twice and thrice its size. We need more land, your Majesty, to breed more men. And not soft lands where men rot like Summer fruits, but hardy lands where the seasons force men to action and reward that action with health and plenty. All the gold of the Spanish Main will not preserve England's strength. Her strength lies in the hearts and sinews of her young men—and her men, your Majesty, have grown rotten with idleness."

The Duke of Buckingham smiled sardonically. John caught the smile and a look of fury turned his eyes to steel.

"Yes, rotten with idleness, I say!"

The queen, who had seen the glance exchanged by the two young men, smiled shrewdly. "An' how would you entice such young men into such a life, my worthy captain? An' how would they save themselves from starvation?"

Smith's smile was as shrewd as Queen Anne's. "The old spirit lives, though beclouded by wine and women, your most gracious Majesty. Outfit ships and men will fill them."

"And thy petition is what?" asked the queen. "That I catch me nets full of young men, drop them aboard ships and set them ashore in your New England for the Indians to eat?"

"Nay!" exclaimed Pocahontas. "The Indians will not molest these men if they give the Indians just treatment!"

Queen Anne made an impatient gesture. "And think you that such men as Captain Smith describes can be just to any creatures? Know I not that he speaks truth? God help me, I am the mother of sons myself!" Her chin cupped within her hand, Queen Anne gazed for a moment sadly into space.

"You wrote," added the queen at last, "that Spain hath design on the north coast. I had thought she was to be satisfied with the south. She likes not bitter weather."

"Spain desires the north passage to China, and will hold all coasts that lead to it," declared John Smith.

"Hast heard of this, Buckingham?" asked the queen of the royal favorite.

"Yea, your Majesty! One hears, too, of voyages to the moon," smiled the duke.

"I tell thee—" began John furiously.

But Queen Anne raised her hand. "This is not a battlefield, my good dogs! Save thy sneers for a less worthy cause, Buckingham, and you, my captain, reserve your wrath for governing your wife."

"He hath no wife, your Majesty!" cried Pocahontas.

"Nay?" Anne gave the Virginian a keen glance. Then her whole face lightened, as through the private door to the left of the dais stepped a slender boy in white satin. He sprang to the queen's side and, with a little laugh, kissed first her hand and then her cheek.

"Wilt permit me to greet thy guests, gracious mother?" he asked, gazing at Pocahontas with unconcealed interest.

THE dream of all that a prince should be, at that time, was Anne's "Baby Charles," the Prince of Wales.

"I came hither, most of all, to see Captain Smith," he said. "Did you bring the new map, good captain?" He turned to his mother. "Two years ago, at my Lord Delaware's house, I talked with Captain Smith. He was but just come from the New World and he had me place names upon his map where, he said, when I come to the throne, I must extend my reign. New England, we called it. I named one bold promontory Cape Anne, and a river for myself—the Charles. There was a Cape Cod which the captain would call Cape James and— Have you not the map with thee, my good captain?"

"'Tis in the anteroom, with my cloak, sire," replied John, his face kindling to the ardor in the boy's eye and voice. "Have I your Majesty's leave to fetch the map?"

For You

whom coffee harms
Here's one that cannot

This is to people who must stint coffee. Or who must drink substitutes. Or who cannot drink coffee and sleep.

The trouble is caffeine—a poison drug. The average coffee contains 2½ grains per cup—half enough to kill a cat. It affects the heart, nerves and kidneys. It forbids coffee to children, and millions of adults should avoid it.

But now there's a coffee with the caffeine taken out. The name is Kaffee Hag. It is pure coffee, an exquisite blend. The finest hotels now serve it. In countless homes its delightful flavor makes it the favorite brand.

We open the pores and extract the caffeine. But nobody misses it. Nobody knows it is lacking unless told. Caffeine is a tasteless drug. Even its stimulation does not come until two hours after drinking, so no one misses that.

All the flavor and aroma are intact. All the quick bracing effects remain. So Kaffee Hag offers every coffee joy, minus the coffee harm.

Does someone in your home need to stint on coffee or refuse it? Or omit it at night? If so, learn what Kaffee Hag means to him or her. Send this coupon for a sample. Clip it now. Enclose only 10 cents. (Stamps will do.)

Prince Charles gave his mother no opportunity to reply. "Aye, fetch it, brave captain, but, prithee, to my own apartments in the palace where we may study it uninterrupted. For look you, dearest mother, when I come to the throne I shall thrust Spain from the New World and plant Englishmen there to grow a true new England."

"'Twill be a pretty task, sweet," replied the queen, "if thy captain's croakings be true. Go, as the prince desires, Captain Smith! I shall ponder on your petition and apprize you later of my decision."

"What may the petition be? Is it ships for the New World?" cried Charles. "Give them, gracious mother! Or rather, force his Majesty to do so. Would that I might go in them, to view those savage lands! Come, captain, and you, Lord and Lady Delaware. You were in Virginia when I was but a lad and have brave tales to tell. And the princess—prithee, come too!"

"Nay!" smiled the queen. "Steal not all my guests, sweet son! The Princess Pocahontas must stay with me while we compare our two kingdoms." Then, as the others followed Charles, she turned to the Duke of Buckingham and said bitterly: "And that is the free, sweet nature his Majesty would sacrifice to the hussy from Spain! 'Fore God, George, Charles was meant for better things. And so wert thou, good George, so wert thou!"

IT WAS not a line of thought Buckingham was eager to pursue and he suggested another at once. "Your Majesty," he said, "I am told that the Spanish throne hath proclaimed all that coast to be its private and imperial territory. They look eagerly to send a new armada against our ships. They will be much offended if his Majesty plants a hardy colony in New England."

"Will they be, indeed?" mused Queen Anne. "An' if there were trouble with Spain at this moment, 'twould end the hope of betrothal between Infanta Maria and Baby Charles."

A light smile crossed Buckingham's lips. His task was to keep his position strong with Queen Anne as well as with his sovereign, James. So far in his meteoric career he had not found the task too difficult.

The queen returned the duke's smile. "Leave me, good George, and discover if our rare Ben Jonson and our still more rare Inigo Jones are at one of their usual quarrels over costumes and stage, thus delaying the mas to this scandalous hour. If it be so, clap their silly crowns together and let the play begin." She turned to Pocahontas.

"Art weary with standing? Seat thyself on that stool and tell me what thou thinkst of my baby, Charles. How doth he appear to thy forest-bred eyes?"

"He appears a prince," answered Pocahontas, "or mayhap an angel. Algonquin boys do not remain as he hath. When they are small, they often are gay and sweet. But at the age of thy son they have tasted blood, and it changes their very natures to wolfishness."

"Methinks, as you say, you like not Indian ways overmuch," exclaimed the queen. "'Tis well you left them off."

"Would God I might never again behold them or Virginia!" cried Pocahontas.

"But that is not in nature," protested Anne, watching closely the sad, dark young face below hers. "Many a heartache did I know for my own old land of Denmark."

Pocahontas looked up into the handsome eyes, and desperately made her plunge.

"Your Majesty, I do not hunger for the forests of Virginia, because here, in England, is my heart of hearts. Had I but known that Captain Smith was not dead, never would I have wed Master Rolfe. And now, now that I am here, in the blessed land that holds him, I can not endure to return to Virginia. O gracious queen," clasping her slender hands, "require me to remain here! Appoint me your most humble lady in waiting! Give a royal command that here must be my home!"

"Did Captain Smith teach you to say this?" demanded Anne sharply.

"Nay, your Majesty, the captain knows that I love him, but not of my prayer to you."

"And doth he return thy love?"

"Most dearly. Yet he saith I must go with my husband, back to the New World."

"And you would remain here, as Smith's paramour? Nay, princess, that were not seemly, in one of your rank."

"Yet," replied Pocahontas simply, "'tis done every day, here, especially among those of high rank."

"Not by my example," replied the queen sharply. "Nay, thy place is in Virginia, where thou mayst keep thy promise to Captain Smith by protecting his people in Jamestown."

"What is Jamestown to me?" cried Pocahontas. "Even Captain Smith deserts it now for that northern shore!"

The two women stared at each other but, curiously enough, without resentment. And suddenly Queen Anne realized that Pocahontas's decision really was of great import. If the feeble colony at Jamestown were wiped out, English popular interest in the New World would drop to nothing. If England's slight hold on the great unexplored western world was broken, Spain would have a free hand there. This, to the mother of the future king, was unthinkable.

"Then," said the queen gently, "thou wouldst not have me grant the captain's petition, but wouldst have him bide here, with thee?"

"Aye, most gracious queen!" exclaimed Pocahontas.

"But, my good princess, mayhap thou dost not apprehend the purport of what thy captain said? He is no mere adventurer, as I had thought—as, indeed, I had been told. He is a man of parts, a thinker, with so big a mind that, as other men think of building houses, he thinks of building kingdoms. His life on wide seas hath given him the high-sailing gull's view of England. He sees how wide our quagmires grow. In Elizabeth's day were such men, Drake and Greville and Gilbert. But methought the last of them would pass with poor Raleigh. And must I say nay to the giant who would build for my son's kingdom, because thou carest naught for the captain's dreams or my son's future?"

"'Tis 'nay' I would have you say, your Majesty, none the less," replied Pocahontas steadily.

"There speaks the aborigine!" exclaimed Anne angrily.

"Aye, the aborigine!" cried Pocahontas, flushing deeply and rising to her feet. "Speak to me thus scornfully, for I was only that Algonquin child who, that long, bitter Winter, after she saved John Smith from Powhatan's executioners, crossed the river each week, with canoes loaded to the edge with corn and deer meat, for your puling colonists—I was that Algonquin maid who became wife to John Rolfe that she might continue to save Jamestown from its own folly in its dealings with Powhatan. Aye, your Majesty, I am an aborigine!"

SHE paused, nostrils dilated, deep eyes outraged.

The queen looked at her with unconcealed pleasure in her beauty. The hautboy piped a solo that rose clean and sweet as a bittern's cry above the silly noises of the rout.

"An' I would that English maids were thus aboriginal!" cried Anne. "Thou hast earned a sweet reward. Would God I might give it thee! Hast no other desire, sweet princess?"

"Only to abide with the man I love is my desire."

"And thy baby son! Hast no love for him?"

"Whether I go or stay, my son is with me, your Majesty," declared Pocahontas with dignity quite as real as that of the queen.

Anne's keen eyes were soft. "Thou lovest thy son, whose father thou dost not love. Aye, that is a sad thing. Methinks thou hadst loved him more had he been John Smith's son."

"Nay!" cried Pocahontas. "My son is my son, and I love him as mine own flesh. He is a stalwart, handsome baby. Already he hath all his two-year teeth."

"Charles teethed early, too. 'Tis a good omen!" The queen nodded. Then her whole mien changed from soft interest to hauteur. "Heed this, Princess Pocahontas! We have heavy tasks, thou and I. Thou, to save that handful of sad adventurers from thy father's bloody hands. Mine, to save my son a kingdom. For his Majesty, in his zeal to make his kingship a thing divine, is alienating this sturdy English people. As to that I can do naught. But I can, by various means, beguile him into allowing me to add power to the throne outside of this island. For that reason, I persuaded him to send old Sir Walter Raleigh once more to sea, and for that reason shall I see that Smith hath ships and men with which to push his bleak New England projects."

Pocahontas, standing before the throne, lifted her chin and returned the queen's look, high stare for high stare.

"An' I return to Virginia, your Majesty, I return to the lodge of Powhatan, no longer a friend, but an enemy of Jamestown."

Vegetable soup with STEERO bouillon and flavoring cubes as meat stock. See recipe below.

A little cube~

but it makes a dozen dishes far more tempting... Add delicious flavor to your food

By MRS. JANE STARR GRANT

FAMOUS chefs are considered artists. They have a "knack" of making a commonplace dish really delicious. Their soups have a certain delightful tang—their salad dressings a uniquely tempting taste—that is why they have become famous.

Such chefs claim that beef flavoring is the secret in preparing many dishes. It adds zest that makes them more appetizing. Not long ago only chefs used this beef flavoring. Today everyone can have it, and without the trouble of making soup stock.

STEERO flavoring and bouillon cubes, made from meats, vegetables and spices, carefully blended, give a delightfully appetizing piquancy that tickles the most fastidious palates. All you have to do is drop a cube into a cup, pour on boiling water, let it cool, and delicious beef flavoring is ready to improve a soup, salad dressing, vegetable, meat or egg dish.

I want you to know how the flavor of STEERO bouillon cubes improves dozens of dishes. Just mail the coupon below. I will send you a sample package free. Or if you prefer to try them when cooking your next meal, ask your grocer to send you a box of STEERO bouillon and flavoring cubes.

VEGETABLE SOUP

Mix one-half cupful each of diced potatoes, celery, carrots, turnips and chopped cabbage, two tablespoonfuls chopped onion, one quart water and two teaspoonfuls salt. Cook slowly until vegetables are tender. Add two cupfuls strained tomatoes, two tablespoonfuls butter, and four STEERO bouillon and flavoring cubes dissolved in two cups of boiling water. Add enough boiling water to make two quarts of soup. Two tablespoonfuls of rice or tapioca or one-half cupful of macaroni broken in small pieces may be added if a thicker soup is required.

The queen beckoned furiously to a lackey. "Lead me the Princess Pocahontas to her retiring-room, and fetch me hither Captain Smith!"

The Virginian, eyes blazing, head up, backed from the queen's presence and, alone within the retiring-room, bowed her head on the velvet coat left by John, and wept.

THE captain, a little breathless, made deep obeisance on the steps of the dais.

"Come closer, captain," said Queen Anne. "I would not shout like one of Ben Jonson's tardy actors. Your princess hath defied me. When I told her I would send you to colonize me Charles's New England, she told me she would return to Virginia an enemy of Jamestown. Methinks you have not managed your love-affair well."

John's face turned a deep mahogany. He flung out his hands despairingly. "How could I dream, your Majesty, she would go thus far?"

"You have wits, have you not?" demanded Anne severely. "You must have recognized that she had a mind far above the ordinary—a mind and a loving loyalty. To do what she hath for Jamestown and for you—to have acquired our ways, our education, so quickly and so well. You have been a blind fool to permit so keen a woman to reach a position of such strength. Why, man, she knows exactly what she doth. She will jeopardize not only Jamestown but our hold on the New World as well. For all we do, know that it will require all your reputation to intrigue young men aboard thy ship. Our youths do not look with favor upon such an enterprise, and no ordinary man may hope for success with it. You may have your ship and our support—but only if Pocahontas goes back as Jamestown's guardian angel."

The young explorer stood with head bowed in despairing thought. The queen watched him for a moment in silence before she said softly: "Dost love her, then, so much?"

Smith lifted his head to look squarely into the queen's eyes. "Your Majesty, most deeply do I love her, but I love my dream of a new England more."

"Then tell her so!" said Anne.

"God help me!" ejaculated John.

"Wouldst rather face the Spanish pirates, eh? Is she so savage, then, in love?"

"Savage? Nay, your Majesty! I would she were. None so gentle, so loyal, so self-denying as Pocahontas. 'Twill be like killing a doe."

Queen Anne lifted one white hand in a gesture of sympathy. "I know! Yet that must be her lot, to give thee to the England that bred thee, and to save for thee that—what did she call it—that puling colony which is all of ours that thrusts Spain from Virginia. Go to her, captain, and see that thou breakest her heart kindly. And return to me when thou hast done."

JOHN'S sense of etiquette was not as strong as that of Pocahontas. He bit his nails as he backed from the queen's presence.

Within the anteroom he drew the curtains close, then stood before them, his eyes on the beautiful head still bowed upon his coat.

"Pocahontas! Sweetheart!" he exclaimed.

Pocahontas sprang to her feet, exalted instantly.

"John!"

The captain, cheeks white, lips strained, did not move toward her. The radiance left her face.

"You have seen the queen," she said.

"Aye, sweet one, I have seen the queen. And I must choose between thee and my new England."

Pocahontas's eyes lighted again. "She will keep us both in England if thou dost choose so? Oh, she is good, after all!"

"Nay, she said not so. She asked me which did I love the better—thee, or my dream of a colony on the Charles River."

"And thou saidst——?"

John could scarcely bear it. "I love thee, God He knows how much. Waking and sleeping since I beheld thee last Summer at Brentford have I clasped thee in my heart of hearts, enshrined thee where no other woman has or ever will enter."

Pocahontas waited.

"I love thee with all the passion the red blood of a man could feel toward thy goodness and beauty. And yet so am I made that deep set within my soul is another love—a love for England. And sweet as is my dream of living here with thee in London, I have another that is sweeter still. In it I see England astride the Atlantic, like the Colossus of Rhodes. I hear the sweet English tongue spoken around the world. I see the feeble fires of Jamestown newly kindled on English hearths in the new-found lands that touch perpetual Winter. And I hear God whispering that mine is the task to see the dream well begun before old age hath stole my strength and faith— Love, wilt thou not help me?"

"Help thee?" whispered Pocahontas, brokenly.

"Yea, help me! For as you are no ordinary woman, so is our love no ordinary thing. To smaller natures than yours and mine the need to eat and sleep together, lest love perish. But to such as us, a marriage of the souls that need not bodies. Be my helpmeet, princess of my heart, but not as mistress of my poor home. Help me to plant a nation on that far American shore, a nation that shall be no sickly thing, like Jamestown, but of such stuff as shall endure the buffets of the world, that shall be an older son from whom England shall draw strength in ages yet to come. Help me, Pocahontas, for it seems that thou and I, of all the world, have power and wish to do this thing."

"Thou hast not said—" Pocahontas's voice was very low—"what reply thou gavest the queen."

John drew a deep breath and wiped the sweat from his forehead with an embroidered handkerchief. Then, with a sudden flush of tears to eyes that had looked unmoved on bloody strife, he made his sword-thrust.

"I told her that my dream comes first."

THERE was silence in the retiring-room. Into Pocahontas's brain, that excellent brain which Queen Anne had so correctly evaluated, flashed a picture. She saw a lovely naked child at play in Powhatan's lodge, at play with the silly game of cup and ball, while beside her, competing with her, knelt Powhatan, laughter and love in his eagle face. Aye, love in his terrible black eyes. Into the lodge ran a little slave girl, brushing heedlessly against Pocahontas's cup and breaking it. Instantly Powhatan lifted his tomahawk and brained the slave child, then with a tender murmur gave his own beautiful cup to his little daughter. It was at that moment that horror of her father was born in Pocahontas's brain. But why? she asked herself. The event was of a type ordinary enough in Algonquin life. Was she, even then, being prepared for the life of pity and devotion that was to come?

Never since she had saved him from death had John been absent from her thoughts. Her whole life had been shaped to his service. For love of him she had forsaken the great and terrible love of Powhatan, forsaken it for this other love which now forsook her. To what end? To the end, it seemed, that whatever happiness she was to gain she must continue to give, by sacrifice. All her splendid talents she must go on using, not for her father's people but for the Englishman's who had refused her gifts of mind and body save as he could use them for this mad land of his.

She stared at him. It was the same fine head she had seen as emaciated as a death's head from starvation—the same fine shoulders she had seen naked to the raw Winter winds of Virginia—the same fine eyes that held the whimpering colonists from murder—the same drawn lips that had dealt justice with firmness to white and Indian alike.

Powhatan, Pocahontas knew, was an extraordinarily keen man, but John Smith was more so. All that line of governors who had done their best for the failing colony had been superior men, but John Smith had topped them all. In England she had met some of the kingdom's greatest. Sir Francis Bacon, their wisest man, was sick with desire for place and wealth. Ben Jonson, their poet, was a roisterer. Their king was a slobbering hypocrite. John, she told herself, was a greater man than any of these, as Queen Anne undoubtedly had discovered for herself that very night. And John Smith lived a selfless life. Surely she, Pocahontas, the daughter of a king, could not be less than he.

"Tell me again how thou lovest me!" she said suddenly.

"With all that lives within me," declared John. "Even that part which doth tie me to my dream hath added to my love for thee making of my love something finer than earthly: making of it something that shall endure long after thou and I are dust, so that, in centuries to come, schoolboys, nay lovers shall say, seeking the last comparison, 'As greatly as John Smith loved Pocahontas.' "

"And as greatly as Pocahontas loved John Smith," added the princess, "for from my love shall come not children, but that nation with the English tongue of which thou dreamest."

John took a step toward her. "Sweet heart!" he stammered.

But Pocahontas shook her head. "I dare not," she whispered.

After a moment John made a profound bow before Pocahontas. "Queen Anne would have a final word with us, princess."

"And I with her," agreed Pocahontas.

AT THE approach of the princess and the captain to the dais the group about it melted away. Queen Anne received the two with raised brows.

"And what is the fate of Jamestown to be?" she asked.

"Jamestown is safe, your Majesty," replied John proudly. "The Princess Pocahontas still hath it in her keeping."

Queen Anne scrutinized Pocahontas's face and her brown eyes softened. "Aye, thou art a woman and the decision hath cost thee dearly. I see the price on lip and eye," she murmured. "Princess, I thank thee. Indeed, indeed, I thank thee! Thy decision means—ah, what may it not mean? Mayhap we now may so antagonize Spain that Baby Charles shall be safe from that Spanish hussy. And mayhap England shall plant such a mighty land on that far Atlantic shore that Baby Charles shall one day rule the whole New World. Sweet princess, how shall I pay thee?"

Pocahontas's smile was as steady and as gentle as the queen's. "Mayhap thou shalt toss me a thought, two months from now, when I am crossing the black Atlantic. 'Tis a bitter trip! What if—" pausing with sudden widening of her eyes in premonition—"what if I do not cross in safety—am drowned—what then of Jamestown? Stop! I can send word to Powhatan by three several messengers, one of which must reach him that will stay his hand while he lives."

"Aye, thou art foresighted," agreed the queen. Then very earnestly, "How shall I pay thee?"

"When Captain Smith returns in triumph from his new colonies," answered Pocahontas, "thou wilt say a woman's prayer for another woman in exile. And I would that when I die my dust might lie in English dust."

"An I live," cried Queen Anne, "many a thought and many a prayer thou shalt have, most sweet princess. An' if it lie within my power, or my son's power, some day shalt thou sleep in English soil. But ask me something heavy. These things are naught."

"Nay, there is naught else," replied Pocahontas, "except that thou now permit me to return to my husband and babe. I am weary."

"Aye, poor princess!" murmured Queen Anne. Stooping, she pressed her lips to Pocahontas's brow and motioned to the captain to lead her away. Then she called a lackey. "Tell Master Jonson to begin his play at once. I, too, am weary."

IT WAS snowing when the linkboys led the little group down the long pier to the barge which rocked gently on the tide. The moon with its ring, it seemed, was the same true weather-prophet in England as in Virginia. The hush which the falling flakes imposed on all the world was no deeper than the silence which had come upon the tempest of hope and protest which had brought Pocahontas to Whitehall Palace two hours before.

It seemed to her, as the barge moved through the white night, that her tale was ended. She could not know, fine and unhappy soul, that she and her love had made of her one of the noblest figures that the great New World was to give to history. She sat wrapped in her cloak, the lanthorn rays quivering on her face, in a solitude on which none of the others dared intrude.

his father's speculation as to Uncle George. Think of having a real cowboy right in the family. If his Uncle George didn't get along with Aunt Etta he probably wouldn't actually shoot her, but he might lasso her. A faint smile appeared upon Apple's face, but in a moment he was serious again. If Uncle George lassoed Aunt Etta she would certainly leave. It wouldn't do. There was the sound of a renunciatory sigh. Moreover, Apple must himself be very careful. Like others before him, he wished that he knew a sure recipe for being good.

"Well," said Mr. Martin, "I suppose it's about time to start for the station."

"I guess it is, Jim. Aunt Etta hates to be kept waiting and you might puncture a tire."

"I probably shall. It would only take that to complete the day."

Apple heard his father come through the hall and on to the porch.

"Can I go, too?" he asked.

"There won't be room."

Ordinarily Apple would have entered into detailed explanation as to how he could ride on the running-board, but this was no day for argument. He followed around the house to the car—a small and battered car, but to Apple a vehicle of romance. Watching his father drive away, he felt a bit forlorn and perhaps he looked it, because Mr. Martin turned to wave at him.

APPLE'S spirits rose a little. Now that he actually was out in the yard there were matters to be attended to. Going first to the shed which served as garage he inspected some tin cans of varying sizes, scrupulously covered with shingles or irregularly shaped pieces of glass. The garter snake appeared to be doing well and so did the field-mouse. Apple spent some time over the can containing the angle-worms. It was half full, and when stirred to action the worms wriggled in fascinating and intricate designs. Then, emerging from the shed and half circling it, he came to the main exhibit.

This was a frog, a large and fine specimen of the breed. To Apple his value was increased by the elaborate preparations made for his health and comfort. A plot of ground, perhaps four feet square, had been fenced with wire screening and boards. This barrier rose to a height above a small boy's waist, for the remarkable leaping powers of frogs are known to the most uneducated.

Within the enclosure was everything the heart of a frog could ask. The swimming-pool (an agate-ware wash-basin) was sunk flush with the ground and contained half a brick, intended to serve as easy-chair or diving-platform. At one side a primitive pergola (a section of board sustained by flat stones) furnished a bit of shade, and beyond there stood a more substantial refuge against inclement weather.

In spite of all its advantages the frog seemed morose. True, he was using the swimming-pool, but not in any gay or sprightly manner. Motionless as the brick, the web-footed tenant sprawled on the side of the basin with only solemn eyes under bulging brows and a nose-tip above water. Thus, while the frog could hardly be expected to sense that Aunt Etta was on the way, it was evident that the general depression emanating from the house had cast its shadow afar. Just then he was hailed from a window by his mother.

"If you are going to stay out in that sun, you'd better get your cap," she called. "It's too hot to go around bareheaded."

Apple didn't think it was hot, but here was an idea—perhaps that was the trouble with the frog. Leaning over the pen Apple removed the occupant. Now there were convulsive signs of life, but he did his best to stifle them in wrappings of his handkerchief and tucked the uneasy bundle inside his linen coat. Caution prompted the concealment. Although actuated by humanitarian motives, something told Apple that just at this time the frog might not be welcomed into the home. Luckily there was no one in the kitchen at the moment, nor were any immigration inspectors encountered on the back stairs. Thus in all safety the party penetrated the interior and came to Apple's room.

These were not his regular quarters on the second floor, as those had been requisitioned for Uncle George, but a room on the floor above. The move had been too speedy to admit of the transfer of many valuable and interesting objects, but he had managed to salvage a collection of boxes. In one of the boxes Apple sequestered the frog. A second hazardous but successful expedition yielded a small lump of ice which was placed in a soap-dish. With the peace of spirit of one who closes the door upon a good deed, Apple descended to the living-room. His timing was practically perfect. The visitors were arriving.

USUALLY when Aunt Etta landed, Apple was the rearmost of the reception committee, but now he was there at the foot of the stairs before Mr. Martin had brought the car to a full stop. His aunt, sitting stiffly as was her custom, shared the front seat with his father, but for her Apple had scarcely a glance. The person he desired to see was Uncle George. Large, smooth-faced, gray-haired, Uncle George wore neither a wide brimmed hat nor hair pants. The waist of his light suit was not encircled by a cartridge belt, and there appeared to be no lasso concealed about him.

Apple, feeling not only disappointed but defrauded, was conscious that Aunt Etta was greeting him in her usual cordial manner.

"Well, Appleton," she said, "I hope you have been a good boy."

The tone implied to Apple that she considered the hope remote and shadowy. With inward panic he realized that it was necessary to make some reply.

"Yes, 'um," mumbled Appleton.

A hearty voice sounded as the passenger in the rear seat clambered out briskly.

"Hello, son! I'm your Uncle George. Come here and let's get a look at you."

Apple came forward a little diffidently. Looking up into a pair of blue eyes not unlike his own, he realized that while his uncle didn't carry a pistol or lasso he gave the impression that he could use either should need arise. Apple liked Uncle George.

"Appleton, where are your manners?" broke in Aunt Etta impatiently. "You haven't kissed me."

Uncle George looked sharply at his fellow visitor as Apple with a hasty peck at an offered cheek repaired this omission. Mrs. Martin came hurrying to welcome her guests.

They went into the house. Mrs. Martin showed Aunt Etta to her room and Mr. Martin carried up her belongings. Uncle George set his bag in the hall and, followed by Apple as closely as a tender follows an engine, turned into the living-room.

"Well, old scout," he said, seating himself, "what's on your mind?"

He could not have used a happier expression. There was something on Apple's mind and, thus encouraged, he proceeded to get it off. In his earnestness he leaned against the arm of his uncle's chair. "Were you ever a cowboy?" he inquired.

Uncle George was a man of quick understanding. "Sure, I was a cowboy. The first job I had out yonder was punching cows."

Apple was relieved. In spite of his clothes Uncle George was a real Westerner.

"Does your aunt visit you often?"

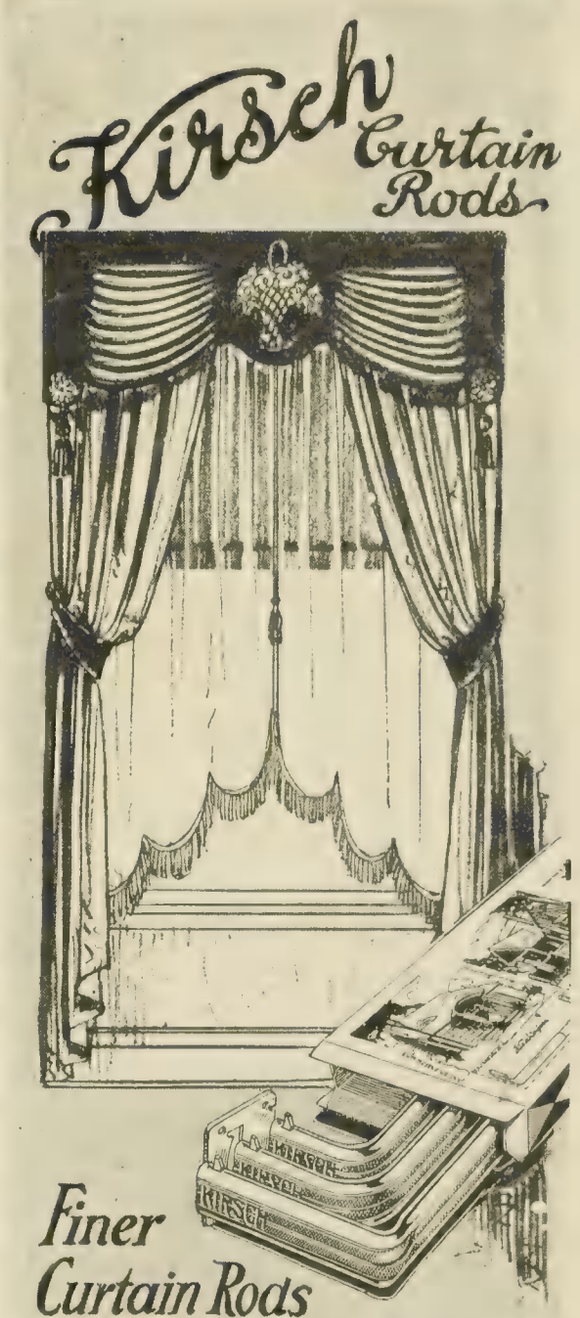
"Yes," replied Apple, speaking as he felt, "pretty often." Then, as if an explanation was required, he added in a burst of confidence. "She's good to my mother—and father has to work so hard."

This appeared to be a little involved, but Uncle George asked no further questions. Instead he put his hand into his pocket and drew out something that glittered.

"As I understand it," he said, "uncles are always supposed to bring their nephews presents, so we may as well start in right. See how much you can buy with this."

Apple, finding himself holding a gold piece, was overwhelmed. He didn't know exactly how much it represented, but he knew that it was far more than fifty cents—the largest sum that he had hitherto possessed at one time. "Oh, thank you," he stammered.

At this moment Mrs. Martin and Aunt Etta coming from up-stairs, and Mr. Martin returning from putting the car up, entered together. It was Aunt Etta who spoke.



"You'd better not let Appleton play with that. He'll lose it."

"That's his lookout," replied Uncle George somewhat shortly. "It belongs to him."

Aunt Etta's lips drew, if possible, into a straighter line than usual. "That's very generous of you," she announced condescendingly, "but his mother had better put it away for him. What can a child of Appleton's age do with ten dollars?"

Uncle George's voice held the soft chilliness of a sealskin coat in cold storage. "He can spend it, can't he? That was my idea."

Ten dollars! Uncle George had given him a fortune, but by so doing had deeply offended Aunt Etta. Quickly he held out the gold piece to his father.

"It was very kind of you, sir," said Mr. Martin with unexpected heartiness. "Put it in your pocket, Apple." There were limits even to humoring Aunt Etta.

WHAT threatened to be an instant of uncomfortable silence was broken by the announcement of luncheon. Although Mrs. Martin had urged something more formal, Frieda, combined cook and waitress, stuck to her own method. From afar she sounded the mess call.

"I ban ready."

As the meal started conversation was resumed. A journey from Massachusetts was far from comfortable. Several faults might be found with it. Aunt Etta found them all. Inspired by her conversation and the food—for Frieda could cook—she thawed, and when spaghetti appeared was positively cheery.

The spaghetti was served strictly in honor of Aunt Etta. It might be thought strange that one of her aggressively aristocratic bearing should favor a dish seemingly plebian, but the craving dated back to her Italian tour. Although the trip had been brief, Aunt Etta spoke of the goings on of the Borgias with the authority of a neighbor, and her paper on Italian customs had attracted much favorable mention at the Friday Club.

Apple, too, favored spaghetti, but it was hard to get on to your plate. Squirming and wriggling from the spoon it evaded capture. Warmly embarrassed and feeling that all eyes must be focused on his efforts, Apple sought to relieve the situation by offering his first contribution to the conversation.

"It's just like my can of angle-worms."

Shades of Italy! Aunt Etta, who had rolled a streamer of spaghetti and was seeking to get it to her mouth, dropped her fork, turned a gentle shade of green and made queer noises in her throat.

"Appleton! Leave the table," commanded Mr. Martin.

It was a bolt from the blue. What had he done? Realizing only that in some mysterious way he had deeply offended Aunt Etta, angered his father and brought a troubled look to his mother's face, Apple slid from his chair and with bowed head made his way from the room.

HAVING learned from experience that if you kept out of the way of grown persons for a while they were apt to forget any unpleasantness, Apple sought his old refuge on the front steps. Voices from the living-room finally brought the information that luncheon was over, but something in their quality hinted that even now all was not well. No straining of ears was necessary, for the voices were raised—and they were those of Uncle George and Aunt Etta. Aunt Etta's voice was shriller, but Uncle George's was louder. Now and then could be heard fragmentary remarks from the Martins. These, soothing in quality, were more or less like a lullaby sung in the midst of a barrage. Then came Aunt Etta's voice, razor edged. "I do not think, sir, I care to continue this discussion. Amy, I shall go to my room."

Consternation held Apple rigid. He knew that inflection. Not only was Aunt Etta very angry, but she was mad at Uncle George. Apple felt tremendous sympathy for him. If Aunt Etta left, Uncle George would be blamed. It was even possible that Uncle George himself would be sent away. This mustn't be. Something must be done—quickly. But what? Panic gave way to relief. Perhaps he could square Uncle George. While most of the village stores were closed on Sunday, the drug-store would be open.

It was a warm, dusty Apple who returned about a half-hour later to find Mr. Martin and Uncle George sitting on the porch. They had been there ever since he left and, while they had exchanged views on many topics, it might be noted that they never once had referred to the absent ladies. It was Apple who brought them into the conversation.

Glad to find that both his father and uncle eyed him kindly, he hastened to call their attention to a parcel he was carrying.

"It's a present for Aunt Etta," he said. "Wait. I'll show you."

Carefully unwrapping the paper he brought to light a bottle. It was a rather ordinary bottle, but it had a gaudy dress. That was what had caught Apple's eye. Labeled in crimson letters was the promise:

No Mosquito Will Bite You

The men looked at each other. "It's citronella," murmured Uncle George who appeared to have some difficulty with his breathing.

"There was a mosquito in my room just last night," explained Apple eagerly, "but the man says if you rub this on they won't come near you. Of course it was your money," he added gratefully, "and I got mother a pencil, with her name on it." A hint of shyness crept into his voice. "I got some presents for you and father, too."

From a pocket he produced cigars and extended them, one to each of his listeners. They were short, pudgy cigars, a little dusty looking and very black, but Uncle George reached for his enthusiastically.

"Just exactly what I've been wishing for! I certainly do thank you," he said. Then, as he looked into Apple's glowing face. "But didn't you buy anything for yourself?"

"Not yet. Now I'll take Aunt Etta's present to her." Crumpling the paper hurriedly about the bottle he dashed into the house.

"I hope she appreciates it," said his father, adding, as he noticed that his companion had produced a match, "you don't have to smoke that terrible cigar."

"Nothing for himself, eh? I'd smoke it if it killed me," declared Uncle George. Suddenly he threw back his head. "Citronella,"—and he shook with laughter.

It was infectious. As they laughed together there was a loosening of constraint and the younger man felt for the first time the real pull of kinship. "It's a peace offering," he chuckled, "for what he said at the table. But you know," he went on more seriously, "it was pretty bad. Aunt Etta will never eat spaghetti again."

"What of it?" inquired Uncle George. "There are other things she can eat. It's none of my business, Jim, but what's the idea of all this kowtowing to that old woman?"

"Well," began Mr. Martin a little apologetically, "she's always been good to Amy——"

"So I've heard," interrupted Uncle George, "but I haven't noticed her being good to anybody. She's certainly made Apple's life miserable all day. Poor little kid!"

"You don't understand. She's about the only one left of my wife's family—took her in after her mother died—and some day she'll leave her all she has."

"Oh, I see."

Apple's father, who wasn't so very old himself, flushed. "I don't want you to think that it's for myself that I care. We were married pretty young and she opposed it. She never liked me and"—with a sudden burst of candor—"I'm not very fond of her. But, you see, I'll probably never make a lot—just go along working for somebody all the rest of my life. So I feel that I haven't the right to take away from Amy and Apple anything she can give them."

"Why don't you start in for yourself?"

"Because it might be years before I made as much as I am making now. I've never dared take the chance. Amy has to economize too much as it is." He spoke a little bitterly. "Competition is keen here in the East. You need more than a willingness to work to build up a business. You need capital and pull—and I haven't got them."

"I see," said Uncle George again, this time more understandingly. "Couldn't you——"

HERE came an interruption. The sharp tap of heels preceded the appearance of Apple's mother. One glance at her was a guarantee that something had occurred.

Even to a small boy in a hurry a flight of stairs is a fairly stiff grade. Apple had slackened a little as he reached the top, but there he again got under way and made the turn through the door of Aunt Etta's room at a speed startling to the occupants. Mrs. Martin was standing at the window looking out, but Aunt Etta was enthroned in a straight-backed chair directly facing him. For the issuing of edicts or the acceptance of tribute, she could not have been more perfectly placed. As Apple skidded to a stop she leaned back raising her hands. Only eager friendliness was in his face as he thrust a paper-covered object at her, yet she reacted as might a czarina confronted suddenly by the bearer of a bomb. Apple hastened to reassure her.

"It's for you," he said. "Uncle George—he bought it, and——"

Then came the deluge. Held firmly at the top, the paper opened at the bottom. Apple felt the bottle going. His frantic clutch served only to accelerate its downward speed. Almost as if hurled, it struck at Aunt Etta's feet and disintegrated. The contents did its bit by the rug and various articles of furniture, but concentrated—she being in the direct line of fire—on Aunt Etta. No mosquito ever born of larva would have been bold enough to annoy her then. Like the victims of the first gas attack, she clapped her handkerchief to her mouth and nose. The present which was too soothe Aunt Etta had failed in its mission.

By far the choicest position now was at the open window, but Mrs. Martin left it in a rushing advance upon the horrified bearer of gifts.

"Appleton!" one might almost say she bellowed. "Go to your room."

Stricken, Apple turned. His exit was not retarded by the sight of Aunt Etta rising from her chair. Climbing to the floor above he tried manfully to swallow the lump in his throat. Banishment to his room might mean further punishment postponed, but, worse than that, he had failed Uncle George.

THE closing of the door behind him was the clang of a prison gate. His bed was a prison cot. Miserably he threw himself upon it, a small bundle, face hidden in a curving arm.

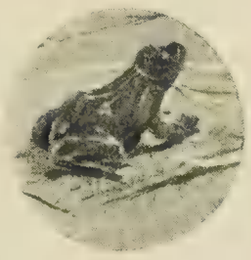
But presently a sound forced itself upon his consciousness. There it was again. "Plop!" Silence and another "Plop!"

The frog! Apple had forgotten him. Wearily he went over to the box. Yes, there was the frog, hopping dourly along enclosing walls—a captive, too. A poor, lonely frog, shut away from his kind. Apple was deeply affected. It wasn't just. This prisoner at least should be free.

The door was technically barred, but there was the window. Prisoners often escaped by means of ropes. Naturally he felt in his pocket and his fingers encountered the spool, salvaged earlier in the day. What could be better? First, the frog was fitted with thread suspenders. Through these was passed another thread, long and doubled. Now all was ready and the escaping prisoner—having shown great uneasiness during the preparations—was gently thrust over the sill.

But as Apple leaned from the window he noticed directly beneath it some garden tools against the house. The teeth of a rake stuck out wickedly—like spikes guarding a prison wall. It never would do to lower the fugitive there. A more suitable spot was a mound of cut grass—which promised a perfect landing-place. It lay a few feet out from the house and a little to one side.

This made it necessary to swing the frog, first in pendulum fashion and later in a circle, something easier of accomplishment when using a fairly short line. The actions of the frog himself made this portion of the work exciting. Apparently he visualized himself as swimming to freedom. The trick was, of course, to release the thread at the exact moment that the escaping prisoner was over the middle of the grass pile, but from the swing which took him to the edge of this refuge he returned so violently that there was danger of a head-on collision with the top of a second-story window frame. In a desperate effort to avert what might be a fatal accident Apple let out a little slack. Quick action—but too late. In through that window whirled the frog.



At the very instant when the harnessed frog was first urged over Apple's window-ledge a much perturbed Mrs. Martin was on the front porch, speaking in a voice close to tears.

"Everything reeks with it," she said. "The room's unlivable. Nobody could sleep there." Her tone rose despairingly. "It was terrible—rushing in—saying Uncle George bought it—breaking it all over her."

"Sort of christening," gasped Uncle George. "It was nice of him to give me credit."

Mrs. Martin was not to be interrupted.

LEAP FROG

"It seems like the last straw," she continued. "Oh, Jim, that awful, awful smell."

"Citronella has a neat odor," admitted Uncle George. "But where's Apple?"

"I sent him to his room. Of course he didn't mean it; but why, oh, why did he do it?"

"I'll tell you why he did it," broke in Apple's father suddenly. "He was trying to please her, Heaven help him! He walked a mile in this heat to buy it for her. When he ran up to give it to her I suppose he slipped or something. I'm sorry, but if she's mad, she can stay mad."

Uncle George looked at his nephew with real approval and then turned to Mrs. Martin. "Did you know he bought you a present, too? He got something for everybody but himself."

"Poor lamb!" said Apple's mother contritely, "I didn't know. It happened so quickly. I got Aunt Etta's clothes off and ran her a bath. I'll see if she's all right now, and then go to Apple."

"I'll go to him now," said his father. "My God! What's that?"

SUDDEN as a shell burst, a series of screams exploded from somewhere above. Starting with a speed which would have been creditable in Olympic champions, the Martins sprinted for the stairs. Uncle George remained placid. He thought he knew the voice. Although no one was there to hear, he ventured a supposition.

"Maybe she's parboiled herself or something," he said cheerfully, as he resumed his seat and his cigar.

Seemingly the Martins had been gone but a moment and there were still sounds of commotion from the second story, when a small figure emerged from the house. There was no furtiveness in Apple's bearing. He appeared to be breathing a trifle fast, but in his eyes was the calmness of utter despair. No use to struggle now. All was lost—and the blow had been dealt by his hand. The only thing left for him was to go far away. As he headed for the steps he passed Uncle George, who threw his arm about him.

"Wait a minute," he said. "It isn't as bad as all that." It almost seemed as if Uncle George was a mind-reader. "We'll fix things all right."

His tone was so assured that a tiny spark flickered in Apple's soul. But Uncle George didn't know.

"Aunt Etta'll go." It was a flat, hopeless statement of fact. Aunt Etta, who had been good to his mother, certainly would depart.

"No, she won't. Don't you worry." The voice was positive. "I'll get us out of this. But—" Uncle George paused to look at his watch. "Son, do you think you could walk as far as the village again?"

"Yes, sir." Apple's eyes were pools of something deeper than gratitude. The village? He would have started to walk to China if Uncle George had asked it.

Scribbling on a card his uncle handed it to him. "You go to the hotel and ask for Mr. Timothy Callahan. Give him this."

No longer weighted by a heart of lead, Apple started. Even as he disappeared around the bend of the road there was a new sound of footfalls. Slowly Mr. Martin returned through the front door he had entered so rapidly. He seemed a little dazed.

"What was all the row about?" inquired Uncle George.

"A frog jumped into Aunt Etta's bath," replied Mr. Martin briefly.

"What?"

Plainly Uncle George doubted that he had heard correctly.

"Yes." The narrator's voice gathered animation. "Jumped through the window into her bath. Looks strange to me a frog should hop into a second-story window, but she says it did. Leaped right past her as she started to get into the tub. Beat her to it."

"Nonsense," interjected Uncle George. "How did it really get there?"

"Ask me something easier," replied Mr. Martin bitterly. "Amy swears there was no frog there when her aunt went in. She even looked under the tub, fishing for a cake of soap she dropped. And opened the window to let the steam out. There was no frog on the sill. It's incredible," he almost shouted. "The frog was there. I saw it. I'd think Apple did it—but it's impossible."

"Of course," agreed Uncle George. "Ridiculous!"

"Then how did it get there? Climb a tree and jump? Fly? I never heard of a frog flying, but maybe it did." Mr. Martin was wildly sarcastic.

"Probably got in the house somehow and hopped up-stairs. It must have been there all the time."

"I tell you Amy searched the place. There was no frog in there. Well," Mr. Martin continued in a duller tone as he seated himself dejectedly. "I guess that just about ends it. When she came out of hysterics, she insisted on dressing. I suppose she'll want to go and take the next train home."

"That will distress your wife, won't it?"

"I told you how it was. Poor Amy."

"Jim"—Uncle George was serious. "I'm willing to admit that your Aunt Etta has had rather a trying afternoon, but we ought to be able to smooth things out. Supposing we talk to her."

"If you think you can talk to her, try it. That's all—try it." It was plain that Mr. Martin was not pining at this moment for further conversation with Aunt Etta.

"All right, I will—but you'll have to get her down here. Considering that the main inducements up-stairs seem to be citronella and frogs, it shouldn't be hard."

"Wild horses couldn't drag her down here," declared Mr. Martin, but he was wrong. A voice was heard from the hall and, accompanied by her niece, Aunt Etta darkened the door.

"If there are no rattlesnakes or cobras on the porch, I prefer to sit there for the short time I shall remain," she was saying.

AS THE men rose Uncle George proffered a chair in the manner of one entertaining royalty. It was accepted, but with no softening of expression.

"I shall not disturb you long," announced Aunt Etta grimly.

Uncle George appeared not to notice the lack of cordiality. "I've been hoping you would come down," he said gravely. "You see, I'm not used to arguing with women who have studied things out as you have and I got sort of excited. I regret that I must have seemed very ill-mannered."

"Humpf!" snorted Aunt Etta ungraciously.

"I suppose as we grow old we are apt to be selfish and crotchety. Of course I'm far older than you are," went on Uncle George quickly, "but you have seen enough of life to understand. The only thing that keeps us young is to have youth around us. And even good friends are not like your own people. Sometimes I've been pretty lonely. That's why I envy you all you've been able to do for Amy and Jim and Apple."

"I have tried to do my best for them," admitted Aunt Etta, somewhat mollified.

"To be sure you have and that's why they are so fond of you," said Uncle George unblushingly. "I have been wondering if Apple would ever care enough for me to walk a mile in the hot sun to get me a present."

"He said you bought it," accused Aunt Etta with a recurring sense of injury.

"He bought it with the money I gave him. It was the first thing he thought of getting. It seems there was a mosquito in his room last night. He was only trying to make you comfortable, and he was broken-hearted because he thought you were angry with him."

"How was I to know?" demanded Aunt Etta. She seemed to have been put on the defensive. "And how do you know he was broken-hearted?"

"Because he crept down here and I saw him. I tell you his poor little heart was broken. I honestly believe he intended to run away."

"Where is he?" The Martins and Aunt Etta asked the question in chorus.

"I sent him on an errand," admitted Uncle George frankly. "But first I told him that it was all a mistake—that you weren't really cross at him. You should have seen his face brighten."

Aunt Etta reached out and caught her niece's hand. "I guess I'm another one who is getting crotchety and old," she said.

"You're not," denied Amy. "Oh, auntie, it would break my heart, too, if you went away."

"Don't worry. I'm not going, child,"

Dining room of "Doug" and Mary's home in Beverly Hills. Done in American Walnut

Why "Doug" and Mary selected American Walnut

IN furnishing their beautiful Beverly Hills home, Douglas Fairbanks and his wife, Mary Pickford, selected the best. So they gave their preference to American Walnut.

The home of these greatest movie stars is simple, lovely and livable. The best of taste governed the selection of each piece of furniture and each detail of equipment.

They selected walnut because of its great beauty and its adaptability. It harmonizes with every color scheme, the tawny, neutral tones of this self-colored wood always blending perfectly, no matter what the present or future decorative scheme may be.

In California, where extremes of climate are common, walnut's resistance to dampness and dryness is valued. It always is prized for its long life, for its ease of upkeep, and for the beautiful natural wood finishes it takes.

In buying walnut pieces for your home, be sure that all exposed parts, at least, are of walnut, if you want long wear and satisfaction from your furniture.

Write for our book, "The Story of American Walnut." This authoritative work is now in its fifth edition. It traces the use of walnut through the centuries and is profusely illustrated. A chapter tells how to recognize real walnut, a valuable knowledge now that the great vogue of this fine wood has flooded the market with imitations.

Correct That Droop Under Your Chin

Watch your chin line, for "beneath your chin your age is written." Here are two photographs of the same woman—would you ever believe that just the chin line could make such a difference? One, the relaxed and sagging chin line of age; the other, the firm and graceful chin line of youth. Even with young women, that cruel droop may creep in through neglect.

Let Dorothy Gray show you how youth and smoothness may be restored to sagging muscles and flabby skin. Hundreds of women are obtaining marvelous results with Dorothy Gray's Russian Astringent Cream ($3.00), a lovely powder base which at the same time tightens relaxed muscles and contracts loose skin.

If your face is too thin, you will find that Dorothy Gray's Special Skin Food fills out hollows and wrinkles, and rounds out contours, corrects dry condition. $1.00, $1.75.

If your face is plump, but dry, use Dorothy Gray's Tissue Cream—a non-fattening cream which softens and beautifies the skin. $1.00, $1.75.

Keep Musterole on the bath-room shelf

Years ago the old-fashioned mustard plaster was the favorite remedy for rheumatism, lumbago, colds on the chest and sore throat.

It did the work, but was sticky and messy and burned and blistered.

Musterole has taken the place of the mustard plaster, without the blister.

Keep this soothing ointment on your bathroom shelf and bring it out at the first cough or sniffle, at rheumatism's first warning tingle.

Made from pure oil of mustard, with the blister and sting taken out, Musterole penetrates the skin and goes to the seat of trouble.

To Mothers: Musterole is also made in milder form for babies and small children. Ask for Children's Musterole.

promised Aunt Etta quickly. She was not used to being addressed as auntie. It was rather pleasing. Turning to Uncle George almost fiercely, "I'm going to take care of them as long as I live," she said.

"Of course you are. But you must let me do my share."

"You?"

"Yes," asserted Uncle George, "you see——"

HERE came the final interruption of a somewhat eventful day. It came in the form of a car which drew up at the door with a flourish. It was a large and imposing car of a make they recognized mainly from having seen it in luxurious pictures. On the front seat was a genial-looking Irishman in uniform and beside him was a small boy. He didn't look broken-hearted. He was beaming.

"I found him," shouted Apple, as the man touched his cap.

"I see you did. This," explained Uncle George to the others, "is Tim Callahan who has been with me for years. It was quite a drive down here, so I sent him on ahead and took the train. But I guess you've found a new boss, Tim."

"It's a fine, energetic boy he is, sir," volunteered Tim. "He wanted to drive the car comin' from the village. And he's promised to show me a menagerie." With Apple tugging at his hand Tim was led in the direction of the tin cans.

"Considering the heat and everything it's been rather a hard day for all of us," said Uncle George, "so I thought perhaps we could motor down the shore some place where there's good music and have dinner. You must know a place, Jim. If you dont, we can find one."

Mr. Martin knew of plenty of such places, but he had never felt able to afford them. Before he could reply Aunt Etta spoke. Her voice was a little sharp.

"You're rich!" It was an accusation.

Again it seemed as if Uncle George was a mind-reader. The Martins' need of Aunt Etta, which had been so precious to her, was gone. Here was a comparative stranger who could do infinitely more for them than she could possibly do. Her importance had vanished. She was just an elderly relative. So his answer was very gentle.

"Yes, I suppose some people would call me a very rich man, but money in itself is valueless. You and I know that. We spoke of taking care of this family. That, of course, is nonsense. Jim is the one who will take care of this family. But you and I can claim our share of taking care of Apple. And I guess it will keep us busy. Son—" he turned to Mr. Martin, "you spoke of needing backing to go in for yourself. You've got it. As a matter of fact, I control a couple of big manufacturing plants, and my associates and I need a representative in the East. If you'll take the job I'll guarantee that it will mean considerably more than you make now—and a future. How about it?"

It was all too sudden. For an instant James Appleton Martin, the elder, stared blankly at Uncle George. Then he realized that it was true, and somehow he appeared to grow younger, until he looked curiously like Apple. His voice was unsteady, his utterance a little incoherent.

"I—I wish I could tell you," he said. "You don't—you can't know what it means—to us." This time it was his hand which sought Amy's and found it seeking his. "There's no way to thank you. It's—it's like a dream. There's no way to say it."

"Yes, there is," contradicted Mrs. Martin. And, suddenly rising, she kissed Uncle George. He didn't seem to mind it at all.

IT WAS late that evening—long after Apple's regular bedtime—that two figures might have been discerned on the porch. Tim had returned to the village, a well-fed Aunt Etta had gone up-stairs and Mr. and Mrs. Martin were somewhere in the house talking of many things they had been saving until they were alone.

Apple pressed close against Uncle George's shoulder. It was comforting to feel near to Uncle George. Thus they remained for a space, age and youth looking out together upon a Summer world. It was Uncle George who broke the silence.

"Son," he inquired, "we're good friends, aren't we?"

"Yes, sir," the answer contained no element of doubt.

"Well, in my country good friends stick by each other and trust each other. Do you feel that way about it?"

Apple turned to face him. "Oh, yes, sir!"

"Then," said Uncle George, "between friends, and man to man, tell me how in the name of the Star Spangled Banner you got a frog into that bathtub."

So Apple told him.

We believe you will agree with us that Apple tastes like more! He is such a real kid—with such eager generosities and good intentions—and they always turn out disastrously! BEAUTY AND THE BEAST whimsically, with his brilliant and disarming smile. "And nothing else makes money in Paris to-day. So I choose the beautiful Américaine, and I kneel at her feet."

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself," Janey had assured him, laughing. But she was not really shocked. She told her aunt impatiently, when Mrs. Stanley protested later against this mercenary love-making, that the man would have been considered mad by his own group to do anything else.

"Well, I've thought it all over, and I'm not going to marry a Frenchman, or an Englishman, or anybody," Janey had ended gaily. Her aunt had stirred those new uneasy emotions of hers once more by asking gravely: "Janey, isn't love going to have anything to do with it, dear? You talk of this one's claims and that one's claims as if it was just a question of what you get. Aren't you going to give something?"

This had been several days ago. But Janey remembered it still, and it made her feel a little frightened. It was as if she were a flower, opening steadily, slowly, against her own will, in this atmosphere of sunshine and romance. The moment was coming, and she knew it, when she could no longer measure and weigh the claims of her suitors, when a new tribunal would pronounce judgment, once and for all.

And meanwhile, here she was in Palermo Bay, young, beautiful, free, admired, rich, with all her life still to make. Janey looked about the lunch-table guiltily. How far had her absent-mindedness betrayed her?

THERE was an interruption: the quarantine officer had come on board; they must all file up to the saloon. Presently luncheon was resumed; the man brought salad; fresh greens again—how jolly. They were discussing the salad when Dorothy and Vivienne Saterlee, in a gale of high spirits, suddenly boarded the Dixie Belle.

They were at the Villa Igiea—wasn't it too wonderful! They'd been there with m'ma for almost a month. Ah, and—fun! Well, they liked it better than any place they'd been yet. Imagine darling old Janey coming right here into their arms! They had "done" Taormiha and Messina, and all that—how do you do, Lord Rountrey? And so pleased to meet you, comte.

Janey would not have selected these two old friends for her companions upon the Palermo adventure, but they were nice enough girls, tennis and golf players, swimmers, trampers, and evidently they knew every one worth while on the island. There were some "ador'ble boys" at the Villa, announced Vivienne. And what did Janey know about Dolly landing a real live prince?

"Dolly Saterlee, you haven't?"

"Oh, you just wait and see if I haven't!"

"Dolly, is he lovely?"

"He's just sugar!"

Lord Rountrey burst out laughing at this enthusiastic description, and Janey felt happier about her friends. The Saterlees were too simple, too gay, too young and pretty to be really disliked by any one.

"M'ma says," Vivienne pursued, when the three girls were in Janey's snug little stateroom powdering their noses, fluffing up their boyishly bobbed hair and chattering with all the eagerness natural after some months of separation, "m'ma says that this trip has cost her thousands and thousands, and she doesn't propose that we shall go home and marry the Carroll boys, and settle down in Richmond for the rest of our lives."

"M'ma's just title-struck," drawled Dolly.

"Yes, but Dolly," Janey asked eagerly, "about your prince—I never knew one. How did you meet him?"

"Why, he was having lunch with three other boys at the villa, the day after we came——"

"Boys," Janey echoed, disappointed.

"Oh, yes—he's only twenty-one."

"Twenty-one. But, Dolly, you're twenty-four."

"Oh, I know, but that doesn't matter," Dolly said carelessly. "He was having luncheon at the table next to us, and m'ma asked the waiter who those gentlemen were—my dear, they couldn't see anything but Viv and me—and so then m'ma sent her card over, and asked them to join us for coffee. That was all. And we've seen them every day since."

Color came into Janey's face, and her brown eyes were quizzical, although she laughed uncomfortably.

"Oh, Dolly, tell the truth! You never met him that way."

"Of course we did. Americans all do that," Dolly answered in surprise. "Why not? He's a gentleman, and he recognized the fact that we were ladies——"

"All Americans don't do that sort of thing," Janey murmured reluctantly.

LAUGHING, listening, contributing to the jumbled conversation, Janey was aware of a faint interior chill. She felt herself decidedly the superior of the Saterlee girls, who were regular romps, not too deeply admired at home, yet here was little Dolly landing a real prince, while Janey was somewhat congratulating herself that a mere lord and a comte were at her feet.

Oh, well, it was all nonsense anyway—titles. What did titles amount to? "I always thought of princes as being men with full beards, hanging around palaces, Dolly."

"Well, Carlos can hang around the Quirinal if he wants to," Dolly returned, with surprising familiarity, "but he prefers to stay here—at least he has of late weeks," she added, a little consciously.

"And do you like him, Viv?"

"He's awfully nice. He dances gloriously."

"But Dolly, your prince—he's rich?" Janey asked, her thoughts an uncomfortable jumble of envy and self-contempt.

"Oh, he has tons of money! Mostly tied up in estates," Dolly admitted carelessly. "His mother told m'ma that he would have to have at least fifty thousand with his wife—that's an awful lot, here. M'ma nearly died of joy—although of course she didn't show it. Dad won't think anything of that!"

Janey's face was still hot.

"Would you care so much about being a princess, Dolly?"

"Care? My dear, I'd die of joy to see the girls' faces when I went home to visit. You know you have a little coronet on your cards above the name!"

Janey had thought of herself as being presented at St. James's—as saying, "it's expected of a family of Lord Rountrey's rank, you know." She had thought of herself as speaking of Comte Lebretagne's social importance: "They're Bourbons, of course. His great-grandfather went to the guillotine in 1794!"

The effect of Dolly's innocent revelations had been to make her furious with the whole puppet-show. Janey was suddenly sick for home, for America, for the old, plain-faced colonial houses and the dreaming big trees, for electric lights and motor-cars and movies and all the stirring joyous life of the shops and tea-rooms and country clubs. "Places" in Surrey, châteaux near Fontainebleau, villas in the Sicilian mountains—what were they to an American woman, after all?

"Janey—hustle!" It was Gordon Raleigh's voice. "We're all fixed! We're going ashore!"

EXCITEMENT, color, all the delicious delays of peasant Italy met them on the long, open pier.

The March sun was sinking, but the air was still warm and bright, when their omnibus squeezed its way toward the Villa Igiea.

Janey, fascinated, hung out to stare.

"That girl was coughing terribly, Dolly—and that darling baby had the most awful-looking eyes."

"Oh, my dear, don't begin that! You'll go simply crazy if you do; it doesn't do to think about it. There aren't any clinics and Red Cross and baby hospitals here, and they're just as well off! Carlos says that these things would only make them miserable, and m'ma says he's quite right. They have lots of fun, in their way. Here, Janey, this is the Villa. Now see if you don't think this is pretty sweet!"

Janey was instantly and satisfactorily enraptured. The deep-green gardens, the big, cool rooms assigned to them, with their wide-opened glass doors upon lawns and stone steps and flowerbeds, and the friendly nearness of the water, all charmed her.

"Come on, stop staring, Janey!" said Dolly Saterlee of this place, when Janey came out to the gardens at four o'clock. "We're going to have tea on the terrace."

There were tables everywhere. Aunt Nell refused to appear—she had had what she called a "Christian" bath and a bundle of home papers, and she was lying down. But Uncle Stan was in evidence, alert, interested, friendly, and the Saterlees had arranged that there should be one big table for the newcomers and themselves to-day.

"This is the loveliest place I ever saw in my life!" Gordon Raleigh admitted. From his wicker chair, by merely moving his eyes, he could see the white masthead and the Stars and Stripes that flew above the Dixie Belle, safe in habor a mile away.

"Oh, Gordon, you haven't seen anything!" Vivienne Saterlee assured him exultantly.

PUNCTUALLY with the tea-things appeared the young Italian noblemen. Dolly presented them with a languid air of indifferent proprietorship that secretly amused Janey, even while it somewhat impressed her. Guido, Count Fraternelli, was an impressive person, perhaps forty-five, stout, square, handsome, a cosmopolitan, speaking English perfectly, familiar with America, bold and definite in his attentions to strange and beautiful young women.

Of the other two, one was a pleasant boy named Rossi, also a count, and the last introduced was the dark-skinned, shy-eyed lad who was Prince Carlos di Rampolli. He was exactly, Janey decided in surprise, like a nice bashful boy of fourteen at the table with the grown-ups for a holiday lunch.

He spoke, it appeared, no English at all, but he could make himself understood in French and German, and Fraternelli translated for him. The older man, indeed, dominated the group, taking especial care to include Janey and her group, and exciting her by promising to take her to tea in a day or two with "the principessa."

The worries, the uneasiness that had beset her during the last stormy, water-driven day on the Dixie Belle vanished. A delightful sense of drifting, of letting events decide her course of action, possessed her. All this was too thrilling, too pleasant to analyze.

When they scattered, just at dusk, Janey found herself walking on the sea-wall with Count Fraternelli. Their conversation reached the intimate stage with no effort.

"In a sense, Prince Rampolli is here in my charge," Count Fraternelli said. "You like him?"

"He's charming," Janey answered enthusiastically, pleased to be asked whether or not she liked a prince.

"There is no finer blood in Sicily," Fraternelli said.

They turned the corner, faced the town, and the light of the sunset caught in the water, red as blood under all the ships.

"I see the Dixie Belle," Janey said lazily.

"Your uncle's yacht?"

"Mine."

"Your friends have been charming to Rampolli," the man said. She sent him a good-humored glance.

"Not so hard!"

"Not so hard—no. He's a delightful fellow," said the count. "He will marry an American girl, his mother tells me."

"Oh? I didn't know that." Janey felt just a trifle flat. He was bespoken already, was he? "Is it announced?" she asked.

"Announced—hardly. We have not found her."

"I thought—he was rich."

"And so he is—in property. The estates are among the most beautiful in all Italy. But the boy can not support them. He will marry an American, but it shall be for love!"

"That's our American way," Janey said, touched and pleased and flattered all at once.

"And that's the best way," said Fraternelli. "But you can have no idea of what he feels for his family, for the Rampolli house!" They turned, faced again the Villa and its palms, the wide sea, and Pellegrino's dark height. "The war has ruined many of us—myself not quite, for the countess and I have modest tastes," said Fraternelli. "But di Rampolli, owning kingly estates, must not sacrifice them!"

"Yes—of course," Janey agreed hesitatingly. She liked his telling her this at once. No fortune-hunting here!

"If it were you that Carlos admired, signorina," Fraternelli said frankly, "your having a lire—or not having one—would not be important. But we Sicilians don't love all Americans——"

HE LAUGHED apologetically, and Janey, a little uncomfortably, laughed too. She thought of stout, fussy Mrs. Saterlee, sending her card over to three strange young men in a public dining-room, of Dolly's desire for a coronet on her cards, and she could almost have burst into a frank denunciation of the American attitude and have apologized for her countrywomen to this extremely polished and charming man.

But some instinct stopped her just short of that, and although her heart beat with excitement when Fraternelli left her, and her slim hand felt the touch of his lips, she could go to her room to dress for dinner with no sense of wishing anything unsaid.

Her colored maid had laid out two gowns on Janey's bed, above which the enormous mosquito net was hooked back like a curtain of a throne—the plain little blue taffeta, all engagingly simple petals; the apple-green gauze with the panniers and the silver lace.

Janey suddenly decided to be her most beautiful self. Her soul had been torn between scorn and envy all day. Now, here, in the stronghold of the island nobility, suddenly the envy won.

She wanted, passionately, to "belong"—to have visitors say that Miss Jane Ritchie Davenport was the one and only American woman the Sicilians had ever taken to their hearts—to outstrip Dolly, Vivienne, every one who had ever married into this group—to be supreme!

If there were a real prince going about unattached, then simple-faced little Dolly Saterlee shouldn't have him! Dolly had been too lazy to learn French. Dolly knew nothing of music or books, Dolly was just blundering into this marriage as she had blundered through high school and through the Midwinter cotillions. Dolly a princess, with a mother-in-law who was lady in waiting to the queen—perish the thought!

When she went up to dinner at half-past eight, between uncle and aunt, music was sounding again in the wide, quiet halls. Gordon Raleigh, Lord Rountrey and Comte Elie were awaiting her, looking, as men generally do, their handsome best in evening clothes. Janey entered the big dining-room between them. The Saterlees, with Fraternelli and di Rampolli, were already seated, but the men rose and clicked heels as she bowed carelessly, and she sent one long,

As Your Hair Grows Grayer

—does he notice other women more?

Smart women never let themselves look old! Gray hair, however handsome, denotes advancing age.

We all know the advantages of a youthful appearance.

Your hair is your charm. It makes or mars the face. When your hair fades, turns gray and looks streaked, just a few applications of Sage Tea and Sulphur enhances its appearance a hundred-fold.

Don't stay gray! Look young! Either prepare the recipe at home or get from any drug store a bottle of "Wyeth's Sage and Sulphur Compound" for only 75 cents. This is merely the old-time recipe improved by the addition of other ingredients. Thousands of folks rely upon this ready-to-use preparation, because it darkens the hair beautifully; besides, no one can possibly tell, as it darkens so naturally and evenly. You simply moisten a sponge or soft brush with it, drawing this through the hair, taking one small strand at a time. By morning the gray hair disappears; after another application or two, its natural color is restored and it becomes thick, glossy and lustrous, and you appear years younger.

quiet look into Fraternelli's fine gray eyes.

Afterward there was dancing, moonlight roaming on the terrace, dancing again. At midnight every one was ready for sandwiches, and Captain Stanley, in honor of his beautiful niece and the safe journey of the Dixie Belle, opened wine.

JANEY was dancing with Fraternelli when the music stopped abruptly at one o'clock. She walked slowly at his side down the long, brilliant room.

"The curtain rises on the second act, signorina," said Fraternelli then.

"The second act, count?"

"He has been happy—he has been amusing himself like a boy, with these good Saterlees," the man began.

"Prince di Rampolli?"

"Carlos—yes. Now—now he has lost his heart."

"Oh, but how do you mean?" A little red flag of danger had suddenly appeared in each cheek. She was not smiling, her eyes were narrowed with unwelcome suspicion.

"But you surely have loved, signorina?"

She did not answer. Her bright, appraising look did not leave his face.

"The boy never has cared before—he has been playing. Now he cares," said Fraternelli simply.

"Not—" she asked proudly, standing still now, to finish the conversation before they should join the others. "You don't mean for me?"

"Does it matter?" the man asked. "If it were so, what harm?"

"Only," she answered with quick pride, "only that a boy of that age could not possibly experience any emotion worth mentioning in five or six hours."

"In America," Fraternelli conceded.

"Anywhere," Janey answered imperiously.

"Oh, forgive me, signorina! You don't know us. And, as I say, what harm?" demanded Fraternelli pacifically. "You surely do not think that he will tell you of it? Hardly. The boy is royal."

"Well, of course not," she said, in a troubled and mollified tone.

"No, he will not distress you—he will say nothing, do nothing, except love you and serve you all your life, and die for you if he may!" Fraternelli summarized it.

A few moments later the boy bent over Janey's hand with the usual pressure of lips and finger-tips. It was a handsome, sleek young head that was just below her eyes, it was a charmingly shy, boyish look that presently met hers.

TIRED. But she was not so tired but that she could sit yawning and chilly in Dolly's room for another hour, rolled in a steamer rug and gabbling joyously over the events of the day.

And to-morrow, more donkeys, more sunshine and church-bells, luncheon on the white, trim, luxurious Dixie Belle, where she would queen it so easily before all these new and old friends! If di Rampolli and Fraternelli had really liked her to-day, and she knew at least that the latter was completely captivated, then how much more they would be interested when they saw her the mistress of the trig little yacht, with Lebretagne and Rountrey and even her uncle and aunt no more than her guests!

Janey awakened in brilliant sunlight, had a dip in the sea before breakfast, and the day began delightfully. The girls drove, swam, played tennis, danced, lunched and dined together, as the happy days raced by; they went up the mountain to the old monastery, they visited Mondello, they explored the narrow streets of the old city. And wherever they went, the five young men went, too.

Fraternelli did, indeed, escort them to tea at the princess's house, a splendid dark old place whose thin rugs the wind lifted on the floor. Janey was amused at the simplicity of it all; she was but too obviously the guest of honor and the Saterlees asked because they were her friends. They had not entered this house before.

The princess showed them her china, her collection of fans, her Sicilian potteries, extraordinarily complete, her carved coral and tortoise-shell, and Janey gave her a check for her charities. Fraternelli, whom she really had come to like long before this, protested about this afterward, but Janey told him quite honestly that she was glad to help the infant altruisms of the place. She had missed the public-welfare note ever since the hour of her arrival.

"The princess lets any American go there to tea if she sees the chance of a check for her charities!" Fraternelli admitted. "But I confess that we all feel a little differently about you—and I am sorry."

Janey repeated graciously that she knew many American women just as persistent in the cause of pet charities, and that she liked to help. And she added, with an oblique glance:

"You say you feel differently about me. Why?"

"Because you seem to belong to us, signorina. There is no explanation.

"Carlos's mother said to me that she had a strange feeling about you. 'She is one of ourselves,' she said."

"You are all only too kind—I do feel it!" Janey murmured. "And I have a strange feeling—a feeling of belonging!" she was moved suddenly to confess in turn. "Sicily was only a name to me before this—I don't know now what made us all decide suddenly to come down here! But from the first instant of our arrival I've felt——"

SHE paused. It was easy to talk to Count Fraternelli, easy to be silent when in his company. The rare, the real simpatica was his peculiar gift. Janey had not met the countess, who lived, with a young son who was reputedly delicate, some miles out in the country. But the count himself was popular in all the varied social circles of the city.

"Carlos wants you to see the villa," he said now, in the pause.

"The city villa?" Janey asked interestedly. "Dolly was telling me about it!"

"Oh, no, no—that's merely the town house," Fraternelli corrected scornfully. "That's a charming place, but modern—that's only two hundred years old! He's not taken the Misses Saterlee to the real villa—but he wants to, now. He's asked me to make the arrangements. This is the real family estate, back in the mountains. It's historic—parts of the main building are seven hundred years old."

"Seven hundred!"

"There are Greek ruins there," Fraternelli pursued, pleased with her emotion, "dating back to the first Greek invasions—long before the Saracens—four hundred years before Christ, signorina!"

Why did the mere thought enchant her so completely? Janey did not know. Insignificant boy he might be, but Carlos di Rampolli's wife would be the Principessa di Rampolli, mistress of a castle through which the main current of the world's life-blood had passed. What if he were young, he was a gentleman—he was amiable and good and nobly born——

The thoughts whirled confusedly through her mind. Twenty-one—and she was twenty-six.

"And why do I tell you these things?" asked Fraternelli. "Because I love my country! Because I see, in a new and beautiful princess, the hope of a restoration here—court balls again, a court life again; the new America giving beauty and youth and life to old Sicily again!"

THIS was the talk of fairyland, and Janey lived and moved, during these enchanted days, within its borders. She awakened to fresh enchantments every morning. Italian lessons were started, with shy little Carlos, Prince di Rampolli, as patient and conscientious instructor and Fraternelli as professor-in-chief. Dolly had courage and no pronunciation, Vivienne neither courage nor pronunciation, but Janey had been born with half the difficulties of the language already conquered.

Gradually she won Carlos di Rampolli from his bashful silences—like a kindly casual big sister she led him to natural talk. For Dolly he had had only brief gallantries; but Janey in the short space of a few days could claim a genuinely personal response.

Maria di Riccordi della Quercia called upon Janey one aftern on Countess di Riccordi. Janey immediately adjudged, from the little crown that was printed on the thin, big card above her name.

She was an American, a rather stiff, silent woman in the middle thirties. In her twelve years of wifehood she had become entirely Sicilian. Her little boy, eleven years old, had been sent to England to school, but he was, of course, an Italian, and must serve his country with the rest some day.

Whether Maria, Countess di Riccordi, was pleased with this idea or not Janey could not ascertain. She appeared a lifeless sort of person. Enrico had been sent to England to school, she said, because "my father, back in Milwaukee," would not have him placed in an Italian school.

"Why not send him to an American school then?" Janey asked interestedly.

"Count Riccordi would not consent to that," Maria responded in an apathetic tone.

"America is so funny," she said once reflectively. Janey asked if her father and mother ever visited her. No, they didn't like the climate, it appeared. No, she rarely went home, because Count Riccordi hated a sea trip.

THIS caller also suggested that these Americans be taken for a visit to the Palazzo Tramontare, di Rampolli's mountain villa. Prince Carlos and Fraternelli warmly taking up the idea, the latter that very day sent messengers there, that everything should be prepared for them. They would start at a good hour in the morning, drive all day, lunching at an inn beside the road, and reach the villa at a late afternoon hour. There they could spend the night, and return either the next day or the day after that, or whenever it pleased them.

Aunt Nell was highly gratified with this arrangement, because it included herself, Mrs. Saterlee correspondingly disappointed that a wrenched ankle made the trip imprudent for her. Gordon Raleigh and Lord Rountrey ignored it—they had arranged to take Janey's uncle on the short sea-run to Tunis, and Janey perfectly understood their resentment that she herself was no longer enthusiastic for the trip. The di Rampolli party would consist of the two Saterlee girls, Fraternelli, Rossi and Count Lebretagne, Janey, Mrs. Stanley and the young host.

Janey somewhat hesitatingly suggested that they ask the Countess and Count Riccordi. Fraternelli, who knew everything about everybody, shrugged his shoulders. That was one of the unfortunate marriages, alas! Both would like to be free, but there was no divorce in Italy. Oftentimes this worked well; sometimes it seemed a pity.

"Riccordi keeps another woman in Rome," he remarked simply.

"But surely—if every one knows that—she can get her divorce and her child?" Janey demanded, outraged.

"The child belongs to the house, signorina!"

"Oh, nonsense!" she murmured stubbornly. But she looked at the countess with a new interest. It couldn't be very thrilling for an American girl to be shut up in an old Sicilian city palace, with her husband enjoying life in Rome and her only child in England at school. However, she had a coronet on her card——

Janey shook off the clouds. The whole adventure promised too brightly, the whole world was too glorious and too gay for much careful analysis of this or any situation.

She wasn't going to take Carlos di Rampolli and his old historic castle too seriously. But she could take them so—no question of that now. If she chose—only she didn't so choose—all the American papers might have front-page stories in a few weeks to the effect that the heiress of the Davenport fortune, sojourning with her yacht the Dixie Belle in Sicilian waters, was about to become the wife of Prince Carlos Francisco Cosimo di Rampolli di Tramontare.

There were pin-pricks. One, of course, was poor little Dolly. Dolly had drooped, grown silent, in the ten days since Janey had arrived to eclipse her hopelessly on all points. Whatever happened, she told herself—and, of course, nothing was going to happen!—she would make it up royally to Dolly. Dolly should be introduced, favored, entertained.

"Can't you see why the Sicilian girls hate us Americans, Dolly?" she asked. "We come in here with money, looks, youth, everything——"

"Money's the only thing that counts," Dolly answered dispiritedly. And Janey was so sorry for her that she made no protest. But even in America, she told herself, there were a hundred social doors open to her that were closed to the Saterlees.

Another prick came on the very eve of the day they were to start on their trip. Janey wished afterward that she had not been such a fool as to go to tea with the Bowditches at all!

The Bowditches were Bostonians, who occupied a small villa down the hill road toward Trapani. Mrs. Bowditch was a quiet woman. The husband, an architect, had come to Italy with his family for a year's study of Italian architecture.

They made no social effort whatsoever in Palermo, driving a small car, living much to themselves. But Anne Bowditch had met Janey's uncle through some navy connections of her own, and encountering the party from the Villa upon a morning walk she invited them to tea. And at tea, in the charming beauty and comfort of the Bowditches' villa, Janey had been introduced to the mother of one of the vice-consuls, an offensive, blunt old American woman who had commented upon di Rampolli casually with the words: "He'll get a rich wife yet! The mother told me it would have to be as soon as possible!"

Worse, she had said of Maria, Countess di Riccordi, "That's May Nickel, of Milwaukee. Nice father. But the mother was a brainless little fool—brought the girl over here, and went crazy—most of 'em do! Afterward she pretended to be shocked, but the fact remained that before they could get poor old Nickel over here—they said he was ready to cut all their throats!—and before the marriage settlements were fixed, that boy of theirs was born! Nice child. They've got him in school in England. Nickel won't have her home now. He sends her a check four times a year, and di Riccordi spends it on a woman in Rome!"

Of Fraternelli this dreadful woman, amusedly and between two bites of a sandwich, made short work.

"He's not a count at all!" she said. "Not that it matters—half of them aren't. His wife calls herself the Signora Fraternelli, like the sensible woman she is!"

JANEY escaped from the neighborhood of this old person as soon as she possibly could and got out into the afternoon air with blazing cheeks and a somewhat daunted heart. She wished, as her vettura rattled through the now familiar streets, that there were not so many Americans in Sicily! They spoiled the place, with their practical standards and their unsympathetic attitude!

But a steamer was in, and there chanced to be some wealthy and prominent Americans of her acquaintance having tea at the Villa before reluctantly sailing for Naples that same evening.

Caroline Duval, beautiful, aristocratic, caught at her hand.

"Janey—is it true you know a real count! You muggins, how did you come to get in so fast?"

Pride and confidence flooded Janey's heart again.

"Oh, Caroline, come over to our table! I want you to meet them. Our friend, Count Fraternelli—Miss Duval. And Prince di Rampolli, Miss Duval."

"Signorina—you had my flowers?" Carlos murmured in French, his fingers gripping Janey's, his ardent eyes only for her.

Caroline Duval saw it—every one must see it. Janey sank into her chair, smiling contentedly. The world was right again.

Continued in the December DELINEATOR

Janey little guesses what thrills and terrors are in store for her on that fateful trip to Castle Tramontare. But even if she did, she wouldn't want to miss them—and neither will you! Lost in the mountain fastnesses of Sicily, the guest of an Italian prince who may be in league with bandits—what can Janey do? You will hold your breath when you read the December instalment of this great romance

Sure Way to Get Rid of Dandruff

There is one sure way that never fails to remove dandruff completely, and that is to dissolve it. Then you destroy it entirely. To do this, just apply a little Liquid Arvon at night before retiring; use enough to moisten the scalp and rub it in gently with the finger tips.

By morning, most, if not all, of your dandruff will be gone, and two or three more applications will completely dissolve and entirely destroy every single sign and trace of it, no matter how much dandruff you may have.

You will find, too, that all itching of the scalp will stop instantly, and your hair will be lustrous, glossy, silky and soft, and look and feel a hundred times better.

You can get Liquid Arvon at any drug store, and a four ounce bottle is all you will need.

This simple remedy has never been known to fail.

She'll be proud of this doll

It will mean more to your little girl to be the proud mother of this genuine Bye-Lo Baby than any ordinary doll she could choose. It's so real that it sleeps and cries—a perfect reproduction of a three-day-old baby. So helpless—so cute—so lovable, you just can't help cuddling it like a real, live baby.

Grace Storey Putnam, the famous sculptor, studied hundreds of babies before she caught that quaint little face, with its innocent loveliness.

For sale at leading toy and department stores. In seven sizes from 9 to 20 inches. Despite imitations you can tell this genuine copyrighted Bye-Lo Baby Doll by the sculptor's name imprinted on the back of the head and her signature on the identification tag. If your dealer cannot supply it, write our Dept. 16C and we will tell you where you can get it.

When Baby Plays The Piano

By Mrs. Youngmother

"OH, the finger marks when that toddler tries to 'play the piano.' Luckily, it takes only a minute or so to remove them with 3-in-One.

"I sprinkle a few drops on a cloth previously wrung out in cold water and wipe off the soiled spots. Then I polish with a soft, dry cloth, rubbing with the grain of the wood. The result is a beautiful lasting lustre. It's best to do only a small surface at a time.

3-in-One

The High Quality Household Oil

produces a clean, bright, dry surface that won't finger mark easily or catch dust and lint. Preserves the wood and the finish.

Use 3-in-One on hardwood and painted floors, linoleum and oilcloth. Use 3-in-One to oil all light household mechanisms. Use 3-in-One to prevent rust and tarnish on bathroom fixtures and kitchen utensils.

3-in-One is sold in all good stores in 1-oz., 3-oz. and ½ pt. bottles; also in 3-oz. Handy Oil Cans. The ½ pt. bottle is the economical household size. Contains most for the money.

FREE—Generous sample and Dictionary showing 79 uses for 3-in-One. Write for both on a postal card.

36 bust requires 3 yards 40-inch velvet, with 1⅞ yard 35-inch material for upper part of slip.

The blouse is for 32 to 44 bust, slip for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6409—The swing of this slip-over one-piece frock is pretty to watch. The circular flares attached at the sides have their upper edge in a fancy outline. Use crêpe satin, satin Canton, satin faille, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, heavy crêpe de Chine, etc., with contrasting or all of one material; broché crêpe satin or broché crêpe faille, etc.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 39-inch chiffon velvet. Lower edge 2½ yards.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6351—The tucks that cluster on each shoulder and the lace jabot are softening factors for this slip-over frock. The lower part, which lengthens the one-piece upper portion, has a circular flare at the front. Use crêpe satin, satin Canton or satin faille with lace edging; or use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille or heavy crêpe de Chine with lace edging or all of one material. Lower edge 1⅝ yard.

36 bust requires 3 yards 40-inch flat crêpe.

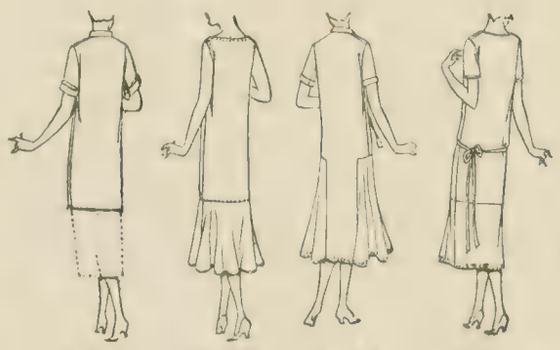
The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6396—6408—The "saddle" shoulder gives a line of grace to the top of this tailored slip-over blouse. The lower edge is straight. The costume slip has a straight lower part with an inverted plait at each side of the front and back. It is attached to a one-piece upper part. Use tweed, cashmere, lightweight kasha, camel's-hair twills, etc., for blouse and lower part of slip, with matching crêpe de Chine or radium for upper part. Lower edge with plaits out 2⅛ yards.

36 bust requires 2¾ yards 54-inch mannish weave, with 1¾ yard 35-inch material for upper part of slip.

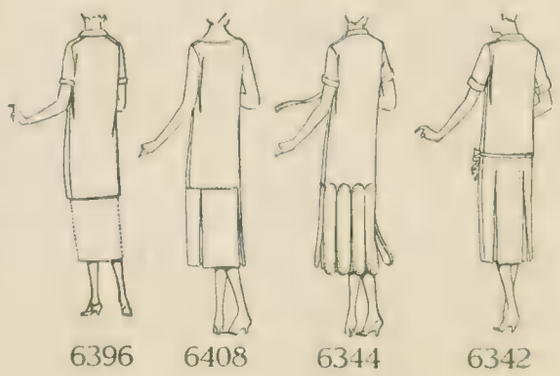
The blouse is for 32 to 44 bust, slip for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6344—6359—A dress that seems always to be blowing in a breeze flutters long tie-ends and loose panels. It is of the one-piece slip-over type. The lower edge is straight. Use satin Canton, satin faille, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille or heavy crêpe de Chine and line the panels with matching Georgette, etc. The six-gored-crown hat is made of satin, etc. Lower edge 44 inches.



36 bust and 22-inch head measure require 3⅜ yards 39-inch crêpe satin for dress and ½ yard 35-inch velvet for hat.

The dress is charming for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses; the hat for ladies and misses.



6342—Another color could peep out where a section is inserted at each side of front and back to match the color of the collar, cuffs and vestee. Make this tailored one-piece slip-over frock of worsteds, cashmere, light weight kasha, camel's-hair twills, wool crêpe, serge, etc., with contrasting. Or use satin with silk crêpe, etc. The lower edge is straight. Lower edge 44 inches.

6387—A frock that ties its ribbon belt directly in front attaches a two-piece circular skirt with a scalloped edge to a long body. The armhole may be cut down or normal. Use printed chiffon with harmonizing velvet ribbon and a satin slip to match the background of the print; or use plain crêpe Roma, etc., for this slip-over frock. It fits closely at the hipline and the flower is hand-made.

36 bust requires 4⅛ yards 39-inch Georgette. Lower edge in round outline 4⅜ yards.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6362—A soft frock that flutters its attached draperies at the slightest excuse is one-piece in type and slips on over the head. It fits closely at the hipline. For an afternoon dress it has a bateau neckline and sleeves attached to the separate one-piece slip. Use plain chiffon or plain chiffon voile with a one-piece separate satin slip; plain crêpe de Chine with crêpe de Chine slip, etc.

36 bust requires 4¼ yards 40-inch Georgette. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6377—10204—A very light cape swings from the neckline at the back of a one-piece slip-over dress with a straight lower edge. The armhole may be cut down or normal. Use brocades, velvets, embroidered Georgette or satin with plain Georgette to match; or wide lace flouncing, all-over lace, wide-bordered chenille brocade on Georgette, etc. The little French ornament is hand-made. The embroidery is quickly worked. Use beads in self-color. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 2 yards 54-inch ombré.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 46 bust.

6375—For soft effects this one-piece slip-over frock recommends shirred sections at each side. The lower edge is straight, the frock fits closely at the hipline, and the armhole is cut down. For an afternoon dress one sews sleeves into the separate one-piece slip. Use crêpe satin with lace edging to match and with matching crêpe de Chine slip, etc. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 3⅛ yards 39-inch silk crêpe, 1⅛ yard 11-inch edging for jabot and 1¾ yard 5-inch edging to trim the godet.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6360—A black crêpe satin, satin Canton or satin faille evening dress surprises by the flash of color—cyclamen, silver, etc.—that swirls out in the plaited godet and is repeated in the hand-made flower cluster. This draped one-piece dress may have a day neck and a normal armhole instead of the cut-down one. The separate one-piece slip may be made with sleeves for afternoon wear. Or use metallic brocade, etc.

36 bust requires 2½ yards 39-inch velvet and ¾ yard 39-inch chiffon. Lower edge of dress with plaits drawn out 2⅛ yards.

The dress is for ladies 36 to 48 bust.

6389—Evening dresses simple in cut are often elaborate in fabric. Brocades, velvets, embroidered Georgette or all-over lace with matching Georgette; wide-bordered chenille brocade on Georgette or voile, etc., with plain matching Georgette or voile make lovely slip-over one-piece frocks. The lower edge is straight. The ornament is easily made. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 3⅛ yards 39-inch velvet brocade and ¾ yard 39-inch chiffon.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 46 bust, also misses.

SULPHUR Heals Skin Eruptions,

Mentho-Sulphur, a pleasant cream, will soothe skin that is irritated or broken out with eczema; that is covered with ugly rash or pimples, or is rough or dry. Nothing subdues fiery skin eruptions so quickly, says a noted skin specialist.

The moment this sulphur preparation is applied the itching stops and after two or three applications, the skin is delightfully clear and smooth. Sulphur is so precious as a skin remedy because it destroys the parasites that cause the burning, itching or disfigurement. Mentho-Sulphur always heals rash, skin eruptions and pimples right up.

A small jar of Rowles Mentho-Sulphur may be had at any good drug store.

I Am Wise

In ways to beauty Ask my help

By Edna Wallace Hopper

I believe I know the greatest beauty aids. For 40 years I have searched the world to find them. I have spent fortunes in that search—made 33 trips to France.

All for myself. Those helps made me a famous stage beauty—gave me a glorious career. They have kept my beauty and my youth. Now, at a grandmother's age, countless young girls envy my youthful bloom.

Lately I have placed these same helps at every woman's call. All toilet counters now supply Edna Wallace Hopper's beauty helps exactly as I use them. And I am sending thousands of tests daily to women who desire.

One is my Youth Cream. Here my chemists have combined a dozen helps the skin needs. There are products of both lemon and strawberry. Also all the best that science knows to foster, feed and protect the skin.

My own complexion—like a baby's—shows what such cream can do. I wish every girl and woman could know its results as I do.

Let me send a sample. Try it. One use will be a revelation. A few days will change your whole idea on beauty. This coupon will bring you a sample tube with my latest Beauty Book. Clip it now.

6315—Double flounces belong to girlhood. This slip-over one-piece frock with its two circular flares is charming in blue with silver ribbon and pale-pink flowers, etc. Use crêpe de Chine, taffeta, radium, etc., with hand-made flowers and ribbon girdle.

12 years requires 3⅜ yards 39-inch Georgette.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15.

6390—The vogue of the flare is popular with all ages. This circular-flare dress with a yoke is ready for parties. Make it of crêpe de Chine or taffeta with matching velvet ribbon and contrasting ribbon flowers, etc. The flowers are easily made.

6 years requires 1⅞ yard 39-inch material.

The dress is for girls 6 to 10 years.

6380—6323—Novelty or smooth-faced plain coatings, etc., make a smart coat with Russian closing and standing or turndown collar. The hat has a six-gored crown.

6 years and 20¼-inch head measure require 1¼ yard 54-inch short-nap coatings, and for hat ½ yard 35-inch velvet.

The coat is for little girls 1 to 7 years; hat for little girls and tiny boys 2 to 8 years.

6376—6188—A coat with an attached circular flare is new. Use short-nap coatings, camel's-hair twills, etc. The tam-o'-shanter may be gathered or plaited.

7 years requires 2¼ yards 35-inch velvet for coat.

The coat is for little girls 2 to 7 years; tam for girls, children, misses and ladies.

6384—6327—10104—This slip-over one-piece dress has an inverted plait at front and back. The elephant is amusing. Work in outline. The hat has a six-gored crown.

12 years and 21-inch head measure require 2⅛ yards 54-inch wool jersey for dress and ½ yard of 35-inch duvetyn for hat.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years; hat for girls 2 to 12 years.

6313—Hand-made ribbon flowers with green leaves sprout here and there on a one-piece slip-over frock for very best. The lower edge is straight. Use silk or cotton Georgette, net, cotton voile, etc., entirely or with Val. lace frills, point d'esprit, etc.

7 years requires 2⅛ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

The dress is for girls 4 to 12 years.

6343—6323—A little slip-over dress and separate bloomers of cotton broadcloth, etc., are sweet with a tiny six-gored-crown hat. The lower edge of the dress is straight.

6 years and 20¼-inch head measure require 1⅝ yard 54-inch wool jersey for dress and ½ yard 35-inch velvet for hat.

The dress is for little girls 2 to 6 years; hat for little girls and tiny boys 2 to 8 years.

6378—A graceful frock with a jabot falling from one side slips on over the head. Make this one-piece dress of Canton crêpe, flat crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine, rayon, etc., with Georgette in a harmonizing color, etc.

13 years requires 2⅜ yards 35-inch velvet and ¾ yard 39-inch Georgette.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6374—6327—The straight-line coat wears its pocket on the outside or on the lining. The smart hat has a six-gored crown.

12 years requires 1⅝ yard 54-inch tweed for coat and 1⅝ yard 54-inch plaid material for lining.

The coat is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years; hat for girls 2 to 12.

6382—6188—Georgette sleeves make this slip-over one-piece dress of velveteen, Canton crêpe, flat crêpe or rayon quite "dressed up." It's a smart frock for a small ensemble. The tam-o'-shanter may be plaited.

7 years requires 1¾ yard 35-inch velvet and ½ yard 39-inch chiffon for dress.

The dress is for girls 6 to 12 years; tam for girls, children, misses and ladies.

6394—Light-weight wool jersey, prettily smocked, with collar and cuffs of white linen, or silk or cotton pongee, cotton broadcloth, etc., make this slip-over dress with a straight lower edge. The bloomers are separate.

7 years requires 2¼ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

The dress is for girls 6 to 10 years.

6412—This little boys' suit of straight trousers and slip-over blouse is suitable for gabardine, wool jersey, linen, linen-finished cottons, chambray, galatea, poplin, madras, rep or serge.

3 years requires 1¼ yard 54-inch serge.

The suit is for little boys 2 to 7 years.

6404—The shorter the dress, the smarter the child. Separate bloomers accompany this slip-over dress of silk or cotton pongee or plain or pin-dot voile, etc. The raglan-style sleeve, straight lower edge and the smocking are good features.

5 years requires 2½ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

The dress is for little girls 2 to 6 years.

6345—6418—6327—A smart ensemble makes its straight-line coat with a plait at each side of lower part of the front. Use tweeds, etc., with twill flannel for lining and slip-over dress. The six-gored-crown-hat is smart.

12 years requires 1⅞ yard 54-inch material for coat.

The coat is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years; dress for juniors and girls 6 to 15; hat for girls 2 to 12.

6347—10934—An appliquéd puppy is a new species of dog. Work in contrast. The circular flare of this slip-over dress is cut in two pieces and attached to a long body. Use Canton crêpe, flat crêpe, with contrast, etc.

13 years requires 1¾ yard 54-inch twill.

It is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6343—French children wear their slip-over dresses short to show the separate bloomers. The lower edge is straight. Use crêpe de Chine, cotton voile, light-weight cotton crêpe, chambray, printed in small designs with plain to match, etc.

4 years requires 2¼ yards 35-inch print.

The dress is for little girls 2 to 6 years.

6410—Chambray, linen, linen-finished cottons, madras, poplin, rep, pongee, silk-and-cotton jersey, soft serge, etc., make intriguing little suits of the slip-over-Russian-blouse-and-straight-trousers type.

4 years requires 1 yard 54-inch wool jersey.

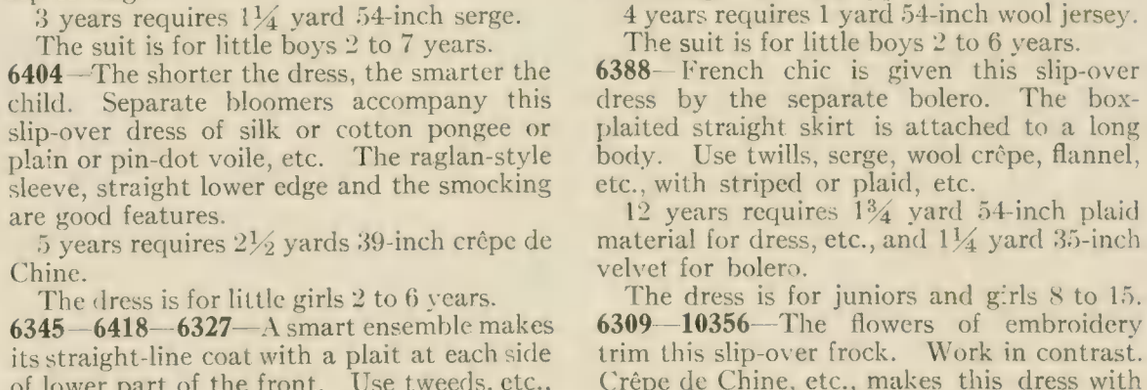
The suit is for little boys 2 to 6 years.

6388—French chic is given this slip-over dress by the separate bolero. The box-plaited straight skirt is attached to a long body. Use twills, serge, wool crêpe, flannel, etc., with striped or plaid, etc.

12 years requires 1¾ yard 54-inch plaid material for dress, etc., and 1¼ yard 35-inch velvet for bolero.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15.

6309—10356—The flowers of embroidery trim this slip-over frock. Work in contrast. Crêpe de Chine, etc., makes this dress with a yoke and straight band of twill, wool crêpe, etc., lengthening the long upper part.



12 years requires 1¾ yard 39-inch crêpe de Chine, with 1 yard 35-inch velvet for bands, etc.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6307—This slip-over frock with its scalloped seam lengthens its straight-edged, long upper part by a straight band. Use heavy crêpe de Chine, silk or cotton pongee, etc.

7 years requires 1⅛ yard 35-inch silk, with ½ yard 35-inch velvet for yoke and bands.

The dress is for girls 6 to 10 years.

"You're wonderful!"

he whispered. And so will he whisper to you when beauty radiates, and your skin is soft and smooth as a result of your having abolished every trace of superfluous hair with ZIP.

Lasting Results

ZIP does more than merely remove surface hair. It destroys the growth by gently lifting out the roots quickly, painlessly and harmlessly, — and cannot strengthen fine hair. Like magic your skin becomes adorable.

The Proof

For fifteen years I have been giving free demonstration treatments at my Salon to convince those who hesitate. If ZIP did not do all I claim, I could not continue these demonstrations.

ZIP

IT'S OFF because IT'S OUT

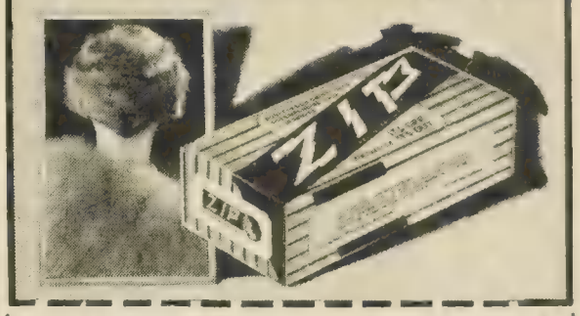
The Epilator—Infinitely Better



It is infinitely better to actually lift out the roots and destroy the growth than to continue using ordinary surface hair depilatories. It is dangerous to experiment with the action of rays on hair roots—and incidentally their action on your skin. Use ZIP ONCE and you will never resort to any other method.

A Husband Points With Pride

In sharing with you a comment by Charles G. Norris on the new Kathleen Norris serial beginning in this issue we are mindful of the fact that the commentator is the author's husband and therefore possibly prejudiced in her favor. On the other hand, Mr. Norris is a novelist in his own right (author of "Bread" and "Brass," for instance, among other titles). A novel that holds the interest of a fellow craftsman through several readings, even if he is the most gracious of husbands, must have some outstanding merit. Here is what he says. "I think it is a great serial. It took me some little time to accept it—for it is so different from anything Kathleen has ever done. I've always regarded her as a realist. William Dean Howells considered her one, too. But here in 'Beauty and the Beast' she has turned pure romancer. Her story is not probable, but neither is 'The Prisoner of Zenda' nor 'Graustark,'—nor any of the thrilling tales of love and adventure we remember and cherish. I confess nothing of Kathleen's ever has held me more; I wanted to race through its pages, and I got the same reaction the third and fourth times I read them. More than that, the story hung on in my mind after I'd finished it, and although I've gone over the last few pages several times before, last night when I read them for the sixth time, I found my eyes wet. It's a fine, romantic story,—full of thrilling adventure and 'grand' love-making. I hope it makes you happy."

Lamentation From a Fat Lady

A good-humored comment on the inconvenience, not to say perils, of being overfat comes from a reader whose identity we feel bound to protect, both because we haven't asked permission to publish the letter and because we wouldn't for a moment think of adding to the tribulations of one so sorely tried. "I read Flora Rose's article," it begins, "in your July number on the Dangers of Being Overfat and was greatly impressed, not to say terrified! But what I want to know is how did she find out about that compensation stuff—eating for the sake of the satisfaction in life which is otherwise lacking? I thought I was the only one who had discovered that. I wish she had suggested a satisfactory substitute compensation. When one is middle-aged and properly married it is not well to indulge in the light flirtations of girlhood. Even if one were willing, one would have to find a Turk or someone else who admired avoirdupois on whom to practise one's arts. One's job should, I suppose, give the 'kick' to middle-age. But suppose it doesn't? Or suppose one has a wedded partner equally fond of food (apparently also seeking compensation for an otherwise empty life) and the table must be set to suit his Lordship's taste? And further suppose that one has a horror of allowing good food to go to waste. What then? All those dangers from inviting diabetes are very real and horrific, but one can always alibi about such things. You can have diabetes because Aunt Fanny died with it, or a bad heart because that's the way poor, dear Uncle Abner was taken away.

"But the every-day, always-with-us dangers which can't be glossed over or made tragic and romantic Flora hasn't discovered: the danger of breaking down fragile chairs or of becoming wedged tight in doors or movie seats; the awful creaking of the church pew when one's double hundredweight is deposited never so gingerly; the insult and resulting inferiority complex when one's white stockings are mistaken for laundry-bags and one's old linen summer dress (dress, singular, not plural!) is used to make a cover for the piano while the family goes away for the summer; the sinking sensation when one embarks in a rowboat and beholds the bow of the boat with the three other passengers rise slowly out of the water and remain there. And the fiendish discernment of friends who offer entertainment always in the form of food—food, more food. Even as a girl my admirers always sent me candy when I craved flowers, and took me to dinner when I knew a concert would be better for me, body and soul. Unless you've been there yourself, you don't know what it is to seek a lonesome, sequestered spot on the beach.

"And those are only a few of the more obvious dangers. It has been observed, too, that nature frequently makes the maddening mistake of putting a light, frolicsome spirit into ladies who buy their dresses from specialists in stylish stouts.

"And if they were only allowed to disport themselves and gambol about they might burn up some of the too, too solid. But thoughtful relatives, friends and even husbands are always at hand to tone down their movements to conform to other people's ideas, and fat heaps upon fat, layer on layer, until they have grown so ponderous and unwieldy that nothing but the slowest, most dignified movement is possible, thus preventing another vicious circle. Oh, no! Flora may know the real dangers, but she doesn't know the most painful ones!"

FROM ALASKA TO URUGUAY

Miles Away from the Nearest Settlement—Not a doctor within call. But the baby of an Alaskan surveyor was born and cared for according to the most up-to-date scientific methods!

In Far-Away Uruguay—The American wife of a college president rears her little boy according to the same scientific methods!

In the United States—In large cities, in small towns, and on the farms, mothers are getting help from the same source.

That source is the Happy Child Department of THE DELINEATOR, directed by one of the best-known child specialists in the country. In spite of his pressing duties as Consultant in the New York State Department of Health, constantly in demand in the baby hospitals and clinics of Albany, DR. HENRY L. K. SHAW always finds time for DELINEATOR mothers.

He will help you, too, if you bring your problems to him.

DR. HENRY L. K. SHAW
Director, the Happy Child Department

Wherever you go you will find the sturdy, rosy-cheeked youngsters whose mothers are "learning from Doctor Shaw."

We are proud of them. They justify the faith that started the Happy Child Department under the direction of the late Dr. L. Emmett Holt. When Doctor Holt knew that he had not long to live he placed this department in the hands of Doctor Shaw. Doctor Shaw accepted the trust, and through THE DELINEATOR he is striving to make "the American child" mean "the Happy Child."

Is your baby—in personality and habits, in mental growth, in physical development—a Happy Child?

Read the details about Doctor Shaw's services on the Happy Child page and in "Ask THE DELINEATOR," page 76 of this issue.

MIX and SERVE

Edited with Willing Hands and a Mean Pencil by a Mere Man

TIME was when we toiled single-handed in this tiny vineyard to inform, edify, uplift and inspire the never-sufficiently-praised sex. Not so these days. Scarcely a month passes that some distinguished scientist doesn't lend a helping hand. For instance, Dr. Guy E. Manning, of San Francisco, recently declared in the public prints that "labor-saving devices to make the work of the modern housewife easy instead are making her lazy. Every man is anxious to spare his wife unnecessary labor, but for her own good she should take some exercise that she now avoids by means of her automobile, vacuum-cleaner, electric dishwasher, electric washing-machine, electric iron and other contrivances" ◈◈◈ Almost on top of this warning comes word of a new menace, this time in the form of a succotash plant. A farmer in Phalanx, New Jersey, found a heavy ear of corn on an unusually tall stalk and noticed that a lima-bean vine with several growing pods was sprouting out of it. It only remains for some enterprising horticulturist to propagate a plant that will save the time the housewife spends mixing the corn with the beans ◈◈◈ A Chicago woman, suing for divorce, swore that her husband regularly threw breakfast muffins at her. She put up with that trying habit for years and until he discovered that his aim was considerably improved by soaking the muffins in coffee; then she had him haled into court ◈◈◈ A New York City jeweler has completed a survey which confirms his conviction that women have little interest in knowing the correct time. He discovered that only one woman to every twenty men ever paused to set her watch by the officially correct time-piece in his window. Then he began to ask women customers what time it was. He reports that he has yet to ask one who answers without qualification. Instead, they glance at a wrist-watch and say, "Why, I'm a little fast" or "I'm a little slow, but it's about five o'clock." Most men, on the contrary, swear by the accuracy of their watches, down to the second ◈◈◈ Tourists returning from Japan report some odd instances of native attempts at sign painting in English. In a Tokio tailor's window, for instance, is a card reading: "Respectable ladies have fits up-stairs." Another shop proudly displays the boast: "Parcels done up with such loving as a wife bestows upon her husband." A store with a department devoted to women's wear displays a sign reading: "Clothing of women tailor. Ladies furnished in the upper story" ◈◈◈ Among the treasures recently dug up on the site of Ur of the Chaldees, the home town of Abraham, were little clay figures of women, made six thousand years ago, attired in flounces, frills and accordion pleats ◈◈◈ An official representing the National Garment Retailers' Association at the Fall exhibition of American fabrics, furs and fashions, announced that "as an American style type the flapper is as dead as the diplodocus," and added, "there never was any good reason why the flapper type should survive here. It is a creation essentially of cheap and bizarre effects" ◈◈◈ To the gems of thought that we pass along from time to time for our fair pewholders to copy down in their little red books, we add the following tribute to the tactful husband. Unfortunately, someone has torn the covers off the book, so we are unable to name the author: "Newly-married couples always decide to be tenderly considerate one to another, but as their rival unselfishness immediately begins to create friction, the husband with his usual courtesy and foresight very soon withdraws from the contest and gracefully leaves to his wife a monopoly of unselfish devotion. That is why so many couples get on splendidly together, and it is a fine tribute to the tact and good management, not to mention the foresight, of the husband" ◈◈◈ The effect on women of excessive smoking is the subject of a book by a Viennese specialist, Dr. R. Hofstater, who finds that the habit leads to sharpened features, taut skin, pale lips, wrinkles about the corners of the mouth, superfluous hair on the face and a tendency to stare ◈◈◈ A North Bergen, New Jersey, justice recently ruled that a woman on the witness stand has as much right to refuse to divulge her weight as her age. His ruling raised hob with the plea of her aggrieved husband, who argued that he couldn't have beaten up the lady, as she charged, because of her superior size.

Made in Cake and Powder

Partners in Cleanliness

For more than thirty years that handy little cake of Bon Ami has been helping women to clean up the house. It keeps kitchen utensils bright and shining, polishes up nickel, makes windows and mirrors clear as crystal, takes finger marks and smudges off painted woodwork. In fact, its uses are almost endless.

A few years ago, Bon Ami Cake took Bon Ami Powder into partnership. And many women now choose the easy-to-sprinkle can when they clean the "big things"—Congoleum, bathtubs, and the like.

Bon Ami, cake or powder, is fine and soft and delicate. That's the reason it never scratches. It simply blots up the dirt and grime and leaves everything spotless. And it never reddens or roughens the hands.

Once you have tried them, you will never be without these helpful "partners in cleanliness."

You rest 8 hours . . .
but your gums sleep day and night!

Your gums are dormant. They get no stimulation. Their health is undermined because your food cheats them of exercise—because it is too soft to stir them to health. Switch to Ipana for one month, and keep your gums firm and healthy while you clean your teeth.

* * * *

WHILE YOU SLEEP, the blood courses through your veins and arteries very slowly. But it does circulate. It restores vigor by purifying your body of the poisons of fatigue.

Yet within the walls of your gums the blood is almost stagnant. Far from the motive source of the blood—your heart—the gums get little purification by the pumping. They are not well purified by the blood itself.

Nature counted upon the natural massage of the food to stimulate the sluggish circulation within the gum walls. Yet the food you eat is so soft, so creamy, that nature's plan has been defeated. The gums get no stimulation, no "exercise"; and there you have, in simple explanation, the reason why the gums weaken before one-half the span of life is passed.

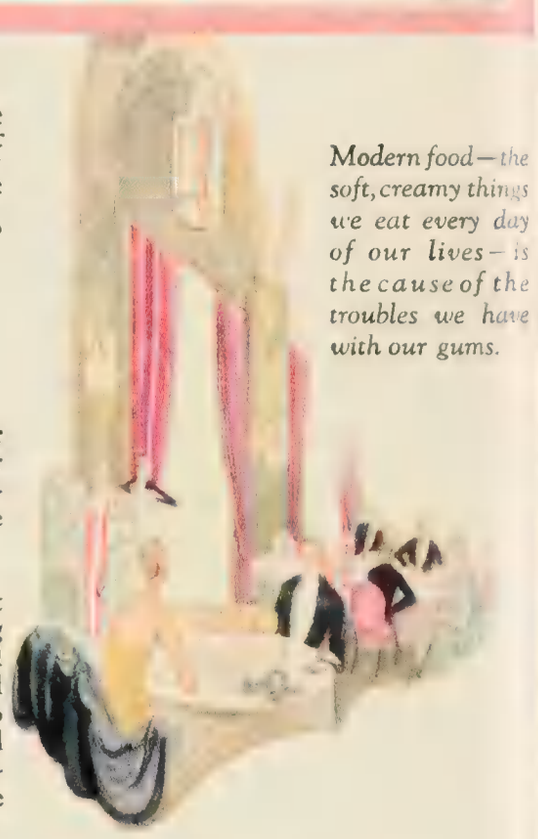
How to care for your gums and your teeth

But if you supply to your gums the stimulation that they lack, you can combat the weakening that modern existence imposes.

As the dental profession will readily testify, you can brush your gums while you brush your teeth with Ipana, imparting to them the necessary "stirring up" that is so good for them. With daily care of this kind you will restore your gums to healthy firmness and will encourage a circulation of rich, fresh blood within their walls.

Dentists know the relation of sound gums to healthy teeth. They know, too, the prevalence of "pink toothbrush" and related troubles.

So it is not surprising that thousands of dentists, to whom our professional men have demonstrated Ipana, now warmly recommend it.



Why dentists like Ipana and recommend its use for the gums

Many of them tell their patients to give their gums a finger massage with Ipana after the daily cleaning with Ipana and the brush. For Ipana contains ziratol, an antiseptic hemostatic known and used by the profession the country over. It is the presence of ziratol that gives Ipana its remarkable power to tone and to strengthen weak, undernourished gum tissue.

Make a thorough trial of Ipana!

Even if your gums bother you seldom or never—even if your own toothbrush never "shows pink"—commence your use of this delicious dentifrice without delay. For the time to fight gum troubles is before they start.

There's a coupon in the corner. If you want a sample, by all means send for it. But mailing takes time and, at best, under the new postal rates, we can send but a ten-day tube. It would be much simpler and more satisfactory to you to go to your nearest drug store and get a full-sized tube, use it through, and then arrive at the decision whether or not Ipana is the tooth paste for you.

Modern food—the soft, creamy things we eat every day of our lives—is the cause of the troubles we have with our gums.

Who is busier than a baby?

He burns up as much energy in growing as his mother does in work

24 hours out of 24 on the job! That's what a baby puts in. Whether it be eating, sleeping, crying, kicking—for sheer energy and enthusiasm, grown-ups can't compare.

Here he is, a wee, helpless bit, confronted by the stupendous task of making himself into a strong, wise man. And hard as he works, he cannot do a good job unless he is given good tools.

The most important tool a baby works with, is proper food. Milk for the first few months, then he must learn to handle a grown-up diet—a period of many dangers.

The first solid food extremely important

The first solid food must not only furnish certain essentials but it must be in a form so simple that it will not burden inexperienced little stomachs.

For 30 years physicians have been advising Cream of Wheat as the first solid food for a baby. It is a splendid food, they say, for two reasons.

First, it supplies an unfailing fund of rich energy—and babies use an unbelievable amount in growing and developing.

Next Cream of Wheat is in a very simple, easily digested form which a baby's stomach can handle.

Another thing—always vital where babies' food is concerned—Cream of Wheat comes to you always clean and pure. The package is triple-wrapped and triple-sealed; absolutely protected from dirt, weevils or any form of contamination.

A wonderful energy food, extremely easy to digest and so delicious that babies always love it. These are the qualities which give Cream of Wheat an important place on the diet lists of baby specialists. It is these same qualities which make it an equally valuable food for older children and grown-ups.

Foods which promote growth, produce energy, maintain health

1. MILK—The best food for growth and maintenance. Should be a basic part of the diet not only in infancy but all through life.
2. STARCHES AND SUGARS—These furnish the body energy-fuel for activities. For babies and children these foods should be largely in the form of cereals, such as Cream of Wheat. Sugar requirements should be filled through various foods—not in concentrated form.
3. FRUITS—They are rich in growth producing and mineral elements; also assist in elimination of waste. Should be given once a day at least.
4. VEGETABLES—Called the protective foods because of their valuable minerals and vitamins. Green or leafy vegetables should be given at least once a day.
5. FATS—These are fuel foods. Butter should be given, as it contains a valuable vitamin found to a much less extent in other fats.
6. EGGS AND MEATS—These have growth producing and maintenance properties. Eggs are valuable for the iron in the yolk. Neither should be given more than once a day.

THE MAN WHO TRIED TO KILL CHRISTMAS

"I AM taking Christmas off my private calendar. Hereafter I will discontinue the custom of offering gifts or other Christmas tokens, and earnestly request you all to do the same with me. The modern Christmas is now actually a day of much worry, distress, sorrow and ill-will."

"I think Christmas is the year's greatest day. Men look to it as a source from which to draw the power and will to daily express their devotion to highest ideals, as a day when the brotherhood of man embraces the world."

One man wrote both those opinions of Christmas. He wrote them both from the heart. It was a heart full of bitterness when he penned the first lines; a heart full of understanding and sympathy when he wrote the last.

Everywhere, for all time, Christmas has been, to people of varying creeds, a day of gladness or of bitterness. It is a day that banishes neutrality. It is a day on which happy memories become glorified or hard thoughts surge like gall in an open wound. For those who can not feel it at all, something in life has gone wrong.

Last year, as in other years, many happy greetings came to us; but along with the happy messages there was a resentful cry from one who had set himself the task of destroying Christmas. This is the card we received from Harold Roland Johnson, a man of talent and sincere gifts:

TO ALL MY RELATIVES AND FRIENDS:

The modern Christmas is swiftly passing the premise of both spirit and meaning of old Yuletide, and is now actually a day of much worry, distress, sorrow and ill-will.

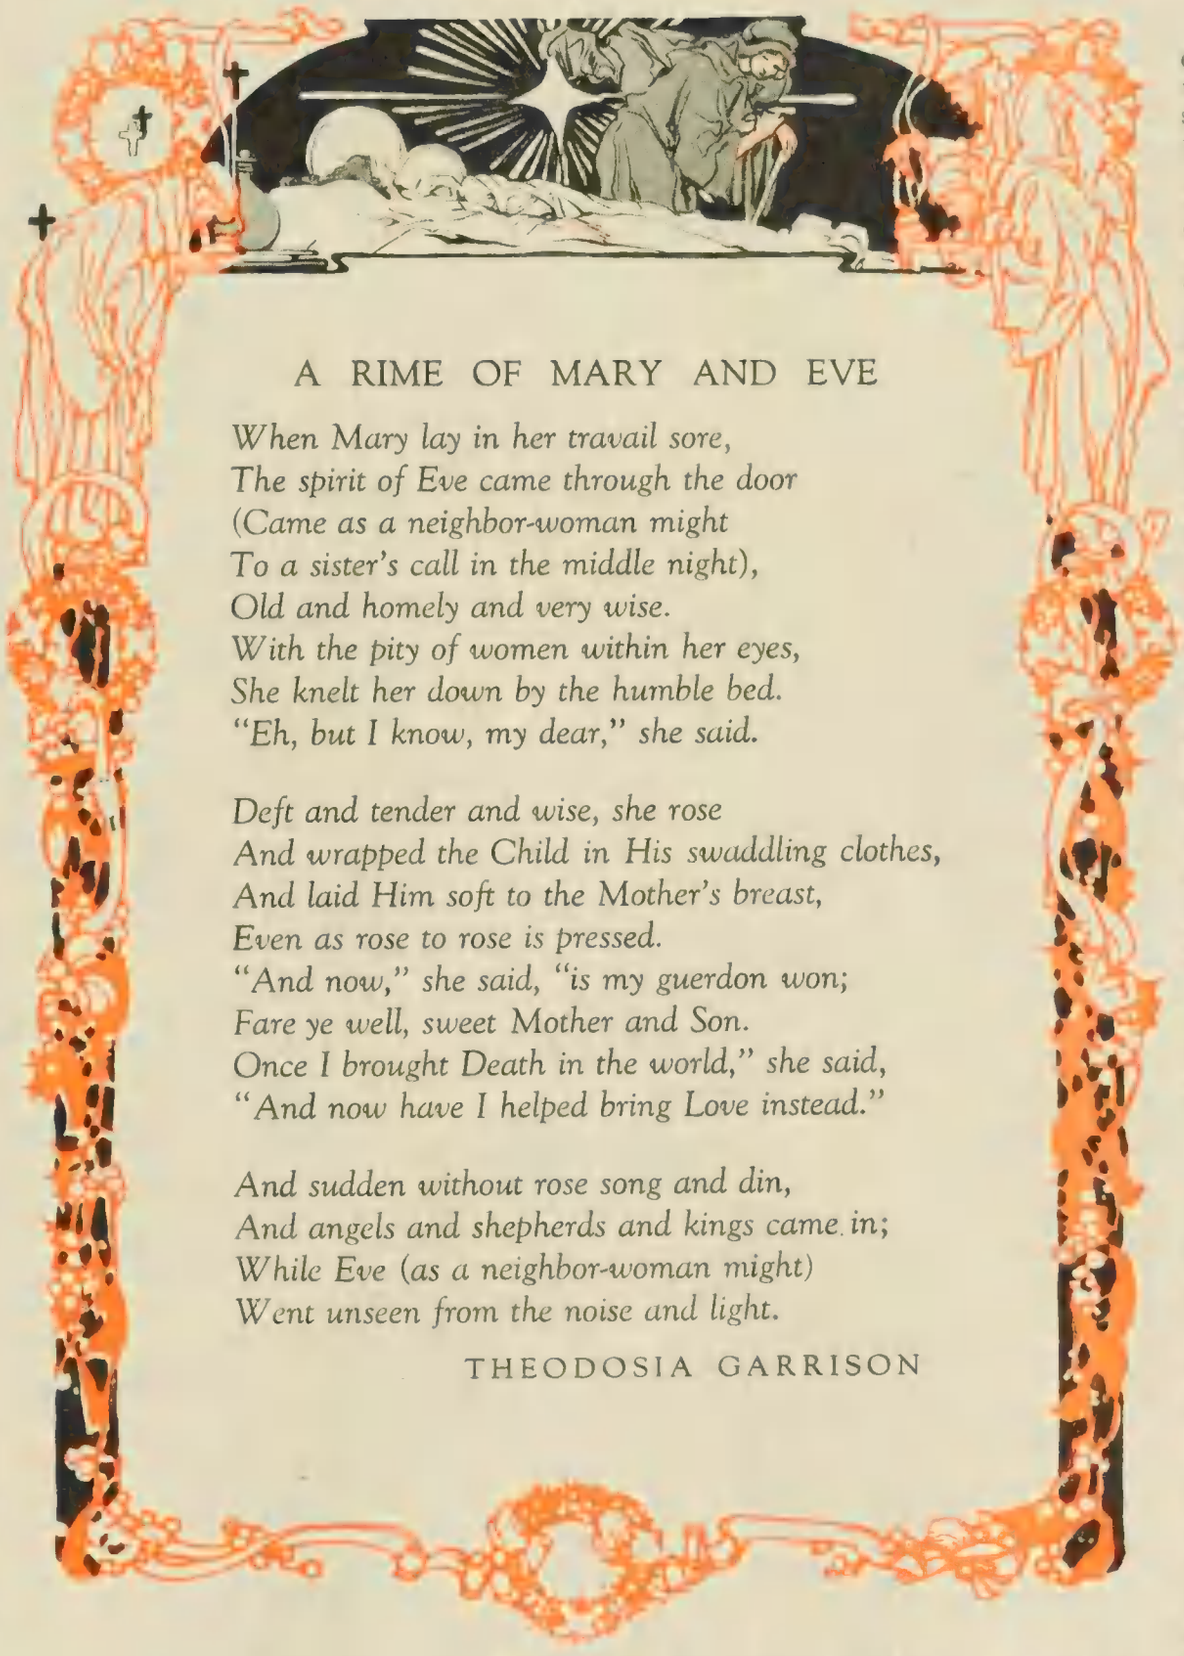
Christmas is viciously commercialized by dollar-mad business men; and good, well-intentioned people are helpless victims of their conscienceless avarice. 'Peace on earth and good-will towards men' has ceased to express to-day's Christmas attitude.

For these sufficient reasons—and others too hurtful, known and true to relate—I am taking Christmas off my private calendar. Hereafter, I will discontinue the custom of offering gifts or other Christmas tokens, and earnestly request you all to do the same with me. Your greetings will be heartily appreciated and welcomed at any other time.

Sincerely,
HAROLD ROLAND JOHNSON.

IT WAS a formal printed card, but we could not pass it by nor put it aside with other printed cards nor with the ads for fur coats and diamond rings to be bought with Christmas money. We also had read the commercial advertisements. We had seen the announcements, "Christmas gifts exchanged before New Year's." We might even have added to Mr. Johnson's dreary indictment of an abused but still beautiful occasion.

But we believe in Christmas, and so those things to which Mr. Johnson had taken exception did not disturb us. His card, however, seemed to us to demand an answer, and we wrote:



DEAR HAROLD JOHNSON:

Out of loam and sand and dead unpleasant things come the most beautiful flowers of the world.

I have known gallantry in the heart of a thief.

I have lived a good many years and I have known a great deal of happiness. I am glad I am living; I have not found anything in life without alloy, but I have not expected perfection.

So, my friend, why expect Christmas without flaws?

A RIME OF MARY AND EVE

When Mary lay in her travail sore,
The spirit of Eve came through the door (Came as a neighbor-woman might
To a sister's call in the middle night),
Old and homely and very wise.
With the pity of women within her eyes,
She knelt her down by the humble bed.
"Eh, but I know, my dear," she said.

Deft and tender and wise, she rose
And wrapped the Child in His swaddling clothes,
And laid Him soft to the Mother's breast,
Even as rose to rose is pressed.
"And now," she said, "is my guerdon won;
Fare ye well, sweet Mother and Son.
Once I brought Death in the world," she said,
"And now have I helped bring Love instead."

And sudden without rose song and din,
And angels and shepherds and kings came in;
While Eve (as a neighbor-woman might)
Went unseen from the noise and light.

THEODOSIA GARRISON

Christmas is what we individually make it. It is a happy day for me and mine; it gives us an opportunity to take a little happiness to sick and lonely and poor people, and a spiritual thought to those sometimes poorest of all, the heavily laden with material wealth. We have never commercialized it in our little house nor made it the day to pay social debts. So we treasure Christmas, and we have to protest when some one strikes a blow at the life of the best day in the whole year.

Believe in Christmas yourself and make it what it should be, rather than leave it in the market-place. Neither you nor a multitude like you can wipe Christmas off the calendar; but you and a few like you can help to make it what it should be.

I can understand why you framed your card. I have sometimes been in that mood of protest myself; but I have tried to live by this axiom: Life is what we individually make it. And so, against your bidding, I wish you a Merry Christmas!

MONTHS passed and no word came from Mr. Johnson. Then, a few days before we prepared this page, we asked the man who wanted to kill Christmas if he was satisfied with his effort or if he had found the great day of peace an empty and unhappy one. Men are shy and often reluctant to bring to the surface some of the strong sentiments that control their lives. But Mr. Johnson telegraphed us on the day he received our question, and his answer is a Christmas message to all:

Christmas was always my boyhood's happiest day. Then I received those toys and things which thrilled my playtime. Mother, father, sisters, brothers—everybody I saw smiled. All were surely happy.

As years beckoned me, Christmas withered. It became a time of mere giving and taking, of scheming and expectancy, of disappointment and pain. Commerce reaped a harvest of dollars because a foolish public submitted to an overworked custom enforced by cunning publicity. Each year I rebelled more. I could no longer endure the great sham, so I planned to protest, to do all in my power to end the day. In 1924 I wrote my sincere indictment of Christmas and triumphantly mailed it to my relatives and friends, to press services, editors and authors. I abolished Christmas and awaited results.

Christmas day came. After arising, I looked out of the window. Many people were passing on the sidewalks, going to churches and the welcoming homes of others. Children danced along with laughter.

Thinking, I sat down at my desk. There lay a pretty parcel from a young girl who had failed to understand me. There were no other presents. Most of my friends and relatives had granted my request out of respect and love. Some of them, though, had brushed it aside and sent greetings. Opening one of these, I read: "Life is what we individually make it. And so, against your bidding, I wish you a Merry Christmas!

MARIE M. MELONEY."

Another: "How can one cut off Christmas? I mean, how could one cut from one's calendar the spring? One might, but the buds would burst and the flowers would open just the same.

ZONA GALE."

Out on the street folk were warmly greeting one another. Under the tinsel and color of it ran a deep current of goodness. Apparently no one was thinking of the commercial intrusion upon his day—except me. I had blundered. Yes! No! Certainly I was alone in mood this Christmas. Lonely and defeated. I had not influenced many; I had only kept aloof from their good wishes and cheer! . . .

I have come by now to realize a thousand times better than before what Christmas means to hundreds of millions—and to me.

Gifts are but symbols of something else, tokens from some one near and dear. Gifts in themselves are of little value, but behind the gift is a human being; within that person a throbbing heart, a soul, reaches out, offering another a thing which is a sign from the heart. Love gives to love, gladly, unhesitatingly, purposely. The hand that accepts receives the greeting from the heart of love, in deep, loving appreciation. To-day, awakened, how well I understand the true significance of Christmas, which automatically dispels its evil but superficial features. Never again will I run from the beautiful thing of worth, hidden though it be.

I think Christmas is the year's greatest day. Men look to it as a source from which to draw the power and will to daily express their devotion to the highest ideals, as a day when the brotherhood of man embraces the world.

This Christmas I will be found with my fellowmen, eager and determined, bending every effort in my endeavor and privilege to brighten this world and all its homes, and to put into effect, into living reality, the greatest message I have ever heard, the most wonderful hope and possibility—"Peace on earth and good-will towards men."

HAROLD ROLAND JOHNSON.

A MERRY CHRISTMAS to you, Harold Johnson and to all of you who believe. Especially to those who out of bitterness have wanted to wipe this day from the calendar. The best we could want for any one of you is an understanding of Christmas. Certain it is that the happiness of Christmas is only for those who lose themselves remembering others. To all of you we wish this gift.

High days and holidays with Kate Douglas Wiggin

By RODERICK STEBBINS

TROTTY FORGOT HER "PIECE" AND DISSOLVED IN TEARS

Drawing by Otto J. Gutter

WHEN Christmas comes I always think of Kate Douglas Wiggin. She was for many years almost a part of our family and wherever we might be, on the Pacific or on the Atlantic coast, if we were within reach, we were together at Christmas. Therefore this season of the year is, for me, inevitably associated with her. Although Mrs. Wiggin has been dead over two years, she is a living influence with all who ever knew her. She was one of those radiant persons whom it is impossible to associate with death. Brilliant, witty, gay, responsive, she carried joy and beauty with her wherever she went, and at Christmas time she was the Christmas spirit incarnate.

Some people, I am told, have the impression that her life was unhappy. I have hardly known a happier one or one with deeper and more lasting satisfactions. She worked hard, but work was a great joy to her. She suffered much from ill-health, but she never allowed her sufferings to quench her spirit. Any one who reads her autobiography, "My Garden of Memory," published after her death, can not fail to be impressed by the happy life she enjoyed. In many of her books, like "The Village Watch Tower," "The Rose of the River," "Mother Carey's Chickens," "Patsy," "Timothy's Quest," "The Birds' Christmas Carol" and "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," there are passages that bring tears to the eyes, but, on the other hand, there are as many that bring smiles to the lips, so that an English friend described her as the "Lady of the Twinkle and the Tear." Mrs. Wiggin's command of pathos in her writings may be responsible for the impression that her life was unhappy, but that impression must not go unchallenged. Read "Penelope's Experiences" or "A Cathedral Courtship" and see how gay and merry and happy Mrs. Wiggin could be and was. Together with real depths of character went the capacity to give and to receive great joy.

REBECCA OF SUNNYBROOK FARM, MOTHER CAREY, THE BIRDS' CHRISTMAS CAROL—these are more than names to us. Kate Douglas Wiggin has made them intimate friends of ours and of our children. An old friend of hers now draws a charming picture of the gay and kindly spirit that was behind these books—the beloved "Miss Kate"

MRS. WIGGIN was a devoted friend of my father, and when she was in San Francisco she was a member of his congregation in the church where he was minister for forty years. My acquaintance with Mrs. Wiggin began when I was a boy and continued until her death. As I have said, many were the happy Christmases her family and mine had together, sometimes at our house, sometimes at her school. She founded in San Francisco the first free kindergarten west of the Rocky Mountains, and in the kindergarten Christmas was always a gala day. In addition to the little tots and their parents, a few intimate friends of Mrs. Wiggin were invited to the celebration. They were prepared for the occasion by thrilling tales of the school, and their curiosity was aroused to see some particular children by what Mrs. Wiggin had said about them. For instance, there was a five-year old boy who was asked if he would play the 14 little blouses blowing on the line

WHEN we saw those blouses, and counted them, and surveyed the rest of the beautiful, fresh-looking clothes snapping in the crisp breeze, we simply had to stop in for a talk with their owner.

Mrs. Marshall* proved to be one of those cordial, friendly people you just can't help liking. Her house was friendly, too—with bright chintzes, glistening white woodwork, and welcoming, comfortable chairs.

"How do you do it?" we asked her when we found she'd done that whole wash herself. "There are fourteen blouses on that line!"

"There aren't always so many," she laughed. "Somehow Dick and Bobby each needed a clean blouse every day last week. But even fourteen blouses aren't so much work as they once were, since I've used P and G Naphtha Soap. I suppose that pleases you!" she added.

Hints from Mrs. Marshall

"Before putting the clothes to soak, I always have lukewarm water in the tub. I never put the clothes in first and then run in hot and cold water. Hot water, striking the clothes, sets the dirt. Also, the first few drops are often rusty and make stubborn stains. With P and G I soak my clothes only during breakfast, not over night. This loosens even the most ground-in dirt without rubbing."

"Indeed it does," we replied. "How do you notice the difference?"

"By comparison. Like most women, I've tried a good many soaps, but P and G simply outdoes them all. It gets the clothes clean so quickly, without ever fading their colors. I never have to rub hard any more, or boil every week. And I not only use it in the laundry but everywhere else in the house from kitchen to bathroom."

Of course, Mrs. Marshall is only one of the millions of women who think this way about P and G, and that is why P and G is the largest-selling laundry soap in America. You see, it does everything better! And it makes no difference whether the water is hard or soft, cold or hot, P and G always gives beautiful, quick, safe results. Don't you think it ought to be doing your work, too?

*Of course, this isn't her real name.

The Miracle Play comes back

Many churches are now reviving this beautiful old custom

By CONSTANCE D'ARCY MacKAY

DAME ELLEN TERRY LENDS A SPLENDID GARMENT FROM HER SHAKESPEARIAN WARDROBE TO DECK A SAINT FOR THE YORK PLAY

PRODUCING a Christmas play in the church as part of the Yuletide service is a custom that is becoming almost universal. As the Christmas season approaches, "What play shall we give, and how shall we give it?" is the fascinating and absorbing question, and to this are added other important questions, such as "How many rehearsals?" "How do we make costumes?" "What background shall we use?" "What shall we do with an immovable pulpit?" and "How can we light the tableaux so they will be most appealing?"

The idea of giving a play in a church dates from the Middle Ages when people found, as they do to-day, that nothing adds more to the happiness of the Christmas season, drawing people together, and stimulating their powers of achievement and resourcefulness. It adds to the mental treasury of young and old, stirring their hearts, giving them lovely pictures to look back on.

It is something in which all can participate, whether it be the city church with funds and experience or the rural church with only a few dollars in the treasury and no experience at all!

Thus in the general scheme of things in this article will come first the city and then the country church and, last of all, production-simplification and workable methods that may prove an aid to both.

High on the roster of Christmas church plays in American cities stands "Why the Chimes Rang," with its medieval processional effects of blue and purple and gold, as given in the First Church of Evanston, Illinois; and the joyous canticle of "The Star Gleams," given on the steps and porch of Emmanuel Church in Baltimore. In New York City two notable productions have been "Eagerheart" in St. George's, and a Nativity play acted in St. Francis Xavier's; while Boston has to its credit "The Spirit of Christianity," as portrayed in the Second Church, where, after the Adoration of the Shepherds and Magi, and the Flight into Egypt down the darkened aisles, there appeared an angel standing near the altar, holding a great lighted candle which typified The Light of the World. From this candle the Apostles took flame for their candles, and from them the Disciples next took

FOR EVERY CREED

Churches of all denominations are reviving the beautiful old custom of religious drama in the church.

Miss MacKay has prepared a leaflet that tells you how to make inexpensive settings for a Nativity play and for other religious dramas, together with a list of suitable books and plays. Just a two-cent stamp for return postage will bring you this helpful leaflet. Address the Service Bureau of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York.

LIKE AN OLD PAINTING IS THIS EXQUISITE ANNUNCIATION SCENE FROM A CHURCH PLAY light and heart of grace, till the whole church glimmered with litten tapers and color, and seemed full of the breath of frankincense and myrrh.

Pageantry, too, plays its part in church celebrations in such different parts of the country as St. Paul's, Cedar Rapids, Iowa; the Union Methodist Church of New York City, and the First Baptist Church of Jersey City. In connection with this church a drama workshop room has been established in the church basement, and here the young people build scenes, stencil fabrics and experiment with lights. Here all costumes are stored and hung, so that from year to year there will be no waste.

Noted poets and artists are lending their talents to the creation of beautiful church services. A hauntingly lovely rendering of the Christmas story is "The Adoration" of the Nativity, by John Farrar. It is written for young people and children, and contains that rarest alchemy—true poetry. It is as if the author had taken for a text: "Oh, ye sun and moon, bless ye the Lord." The Holy Family is seen in the chancel, and from right and left of it, and up the aisles, come not only the shepherds and kings with their gifts, but the pale moon and the little attendant stars who draw near to worship. The golden sun, east wind, west wind, the silver rain, the flowers of the Holy Land, all bow low in adoration. The play has both a churchly and secular ending. The church production ends with a flower processional and the song of "It Came Upon the Midnight Clear."

Then, too, there are the medieval mystery plays, such as the one in which St. Catherine figures, which Edith Craig, England's greatest woman producer, revived in the old cathedral city of York last Christmastide. This is of special interest because some of these ancient mystery plays have been acted in this country—notably the Chester Nativity play, which is very quaint and simple. It is also of interest because England as well as America is reviving ecclesiastical drama, and in several instances has evolved ideas of such lasting significance that America could copy them to advantage; for what thrives better than a transplanted idea?

The first of these ideas is the series of drama services held in St. Paul's, Covent Garden, London, on Sunday afternoons. They consist of a sermon, music and a biblical one-act play which is staged in the chancel. Thus the Christmas play—the great event of the year—is led up to by a number of preparatory dramas. This last Christmas the Yuletide play was "The Cure of Souls" by Laurence Housman, written around the life of St. Francis. There is a cycle of these St. Francis plays, each in one act, which can be given singly or consecutively, and their requisites are as unpretentious as the life of the Little Poor Man. In a troubled world, what better at the Christmas season than the note of brotherly love and tranquillity that one associates with this saint whom all the world reveres?

The plays of St. Paul's in Covent Garden are very simply staged, and in direct antithesis to this is the magnificent (yet inexpensive) production of that modern miracle play "The Great World Theater" by Von Hofmannsthal as given in St. Edward's Church, Holbeck, Leeds. This play, also under the direction of Edith Craig, was produced during the Christmas holidays. Leeds, as every one knows, is a grimy manufacturing city, a counterpart of Arnold Bennett's "Five-Towns." Yet in the midst of a manufacturing suburb, with every-day citizens for the play's participants, such a vision of beauty and light was achieved that one of the London papers declared that not for a thousand years in any English-

"WHERE IS MY FATHER?"

A story you will never forget By ELLIS PARKER BUTLER

Christmas brings the answer to a nameless child

IN THE corner of the yard was a wonderful apple-tree with bark that was smooth and rough—smooth in places and rough in places—and up and down the trunk of the apple-tree hurried or lingered wonderful insects. Mostly they were ants, black ants, hastening here and there, running to each other and touching their feelers, running away from each other again, carrying things up and down the tree, busy and interesting, but there were also beetles. Vidda could sit by the hour on her haunches, now and then steadying herself with a hand on the grass, watching the tree people.

Not far from the tree was the long narrow strip of flower-garden—perennials mostly. There were phlox and iris and bleeding-hearts and a dozen other kinds. A bleeding-heart broke into two cunning little pinky rabbits; if you picked one of the phlox flowers and sucked its tiny little tube gently you got a sip of sweet honey. It was an interesting world; there was always something interesting. If it was a shut-in world, Vidda did not notice; she was always too busy with affairs of the utmost importance.

You don't see the yard yet. You must see the grass that came up tenderly green in the Spring and was never cut, making long wisps in the Summer to be braided like hair. You must see the long-stemmed dandelions turning into magic balls of down that floated away at a puff of the breath. You must see the wire wall covered thickly with honeysuckle, noisy with bees in June.

The wire wall went all about the place. In front, against the street, it was hidden by tall snowball bushes except at the gate, which was of boards without a crack between. It was a beautiful shut-in world. In Winter there was snow and sometimes icy places on the brick walk for sliding.

Vidda lived in this wonderful place with her grandmother and her mother, but her mother was Miss Anne Markey who had never been married, and only a part of the high wire wall had been built by Miss Anne. It seems that when Miss Anne did not go away—as every one expected she would when Vidda was born—the Greggs on one side built a high wire wall and planted honeysuckle and bushes, and the Towners on the other side built another high wire wall and planted honeysuckle and bushes, so Miss Anne built the wire wall at front and rear. It was better, because no one wanted to speak to her and she did not want to speak to any one. So Vidda knew the yard first as a baby in a carriage—in the sun by the house or in the shade under the apple-tree—and then toddling here and there, falling and picking herself up again, and then, as the years went by, sitting on her heels studying the world and all that is therein.

Her name was Vidda because she was not a boy and could not be called David, which was the name of the man who should have been her father, but he died. He went away somewhere that does not matter and died there, so he never came back to be Vidda's father, and Anne every day held herself straighter and was more severe of face—a large dark oval face with hard black eyes that saw but did not speak. So it was always to the grandmother that Vidda went, for the grandmother had eyes that talked.

You would have loved the grandmother. She was quite old and very gentle, and quiet in the way of one the world has hurt and may hurt again, and a little tremulous for that reason, but making the best of everything as cheerfully as possible, admiring the red leaves of the maples along the street when the sun glowed on them in the Autumn, showing Vidda how beautiful a dandelion might be, looking at the clouds in the blue sky. They made two worlds of it, Anne and the grandmother; Anne's world was a tall dark world walled in and somber; the grandmother's world was a wide, glowing world with sunshine that the honeysuckled wall could not keep out.

It was only Anne the people did not want to see, and the grandmother would not be unhappy—no unhappier than she had to be. Sometimes she took the seams of her skirt in her fingers and did funny steps to make Vidda laugh. The grandmother went to market and spoke to people, and people spoke to her; she went to church; presently she took Vidda to Sunday-school.

"You will do as you please," Anne said. "I say nothing."

"IS MY SWEET LITTLE BABY BROTHER JESUS IN THAT MANGER?" VIDDA ASKED, "BECAUSE I WANT TO SEE HIM!"

ONE day, late in a hot August, a cicada—a locust—lighted on the bark of the apple-tree as Vidda was haunched down watching her ants. It came against the tree with a thump and felt about with its curved claws until it had a firm purchase. Then it made a shrill sudden whir, so that Vidda dodged back her head and put her hand out against the grass. But the cicada paid no attention. It screeched loud and long and industriously and Vidda leaned forward. Her eyes were not like her mother's—they were blue—and now they were round with new amazement. She lifted a finger and touched the cicada gently.

She quite fell back as the cicada leaped away from the apple-tree with a frightening whir of its wings and she heard it thump against the honeysuckled wall of wire. She saw where it had alighted and she went close to the honeysuckle, haunching down again, and presently the cicada began its loud song once more. The little girl was watching the insect so intently that she did not notice that the honeysuckle had grown all to the top of the wire wall, as honeysuckle will, until she saw a face close to her face—a ruddy freckled face. She looked at the boy solemnly, without speaking, and the boy looked at Vidda.

"What made that noise?" the boy asked.

"It's a bug. Here it is, right here," Vidda said.

"I know who you are," the boy said.

"I know who I am, too," Vidda said.

"You're the girl that ain't got any father," the boy said. "I durstn't play with you, because you ain't got any father. There durstn't nobody play with you."

This was new to Vidda. The ants had never told her that, nor the dandelions, nor the phlox, nor her grandmother. Of course Anne had never told her, because Anne was silent.

"Have you got a father?" Vidda asked.

"Sure I got a father!" bragged the boy. "Everybody's got a father but you. You ain't."

"Why?" Vidda asked, for she was very much interested.

"You ain't good enough to," said the boy frankly. "You ain't decent. I got to keep away from you. You get back in your yard there, and let me look at the bug."

Vidda went back; she walked backward, holding her hands behind her, staring at the place where she had seen the boy's face. The boy must have touched the cicada, for it whirred up from the honeysuckle and passed the apple-tree and flew high above the rear wire wall and over the stable that raised its roof mysteriously beyond the wall. Vidda haunched down by the apple-tree again. She hoped the cicada would come back, but it never did.

The Pickwickians go to spend Christmas at Dingley Dell

"I DARE SAY IT'S PLUMB FOOLISH OF ME, ANNE," JOHN MARTIN WAS SAYING, "BUT I THOUGHT MAYBE YOU MIGHT SORT OF GIVE ME TO VIDDA—AS A KIND OF CHRISTMAS PRESENT"

She did not worry much over not having a father; she had never had one and did not know it was a thing to be worried over. Now and then she thought of what the boy had said, and she felt a little hurt, but that was more because of the way he had said it. On the whole, she gave the most thought to his ruddy freckles. She had never seen any one with freckles. They were as interesting as ants. She decided that freckles were a very fine thing to have since evidently they were granted only to those who had fathers. She sought a mirror for almost the first time in her life and examined her face with great care, but there was not even the slightest rudiment of a single freckle to be found there. Her face was as white as the petal of a peony with a touch of rose. That was too bad, of course, but only what a fatherless child might expect.

After that Vidda often went to the wire wall on the Gregg side and, sitting on her heels, peered between the scant leaves into the Gregg yard. Sometimes she saw the boy and sometimes she did not. Sometimes other boys were there, playing with the Gregg boy, and once or twice a small girl was there. They played rough games mostly, and seemed to have a great deal of fun and some quarrels that were extremely interesting. Vidda spent whole afternoons thus watching. Neither Anne nor the grandmother thought anything of it; the child was always sitting on her heels watching the ants and beetles, one place or another. They did not know she was waiting and waiting until a boy or a girl came near so that she might see who had freckles and who had not.

PRESENTLY Vidda thought of the other wire wall and she went to that one, too. Things were quite different beyond that wire wall. There were two little girls in that yard, and sometimes more little girls, but never any boys. While the Gregg yard was worn almost bare of grass and was sandy, the Towners yard was close-clipped lawn with beds of flowers and a tall, flat-topped vase that birds came and bathed in. It was very lovely, like a dream, but the little girls had freckles. They came one day to pick flowers close to the honeysuckled wire wall and Vidda saw quite plainly that they had a father, because there were little processions of freckles over their noses and across their cheeks under their eyes. She sat entirely motionless and silent until they went away.

In Summer there was no Sunday-school, of course, but with the coming of Autumn Sunday-school began again and what had been one of the happiest things for Vidda was not so happy any more—her seat next the teacher. Always she had sat next the teacher, close to her, and often the teacher held her hand, but now Vidda felt, rather than saw, that the other little girls sat away from her. This, she was afraid, was because she was not—as the boy had said—decent. They durstn't sit close to her. They had fathers, probably; certainly they all had freckles, more or less. One or two did not have many and probably hadn't very much in the way of fathers, but any sort of father was doubtless better than none.

A great deal is learned in Sunday-school—many wonderful things about Joseph and his coat of many colors and being good and kind, but Vidda learned there something that was far more wonderful. At first she could hardly believe it; she thought it must be a mistake. She thought she had not heard correctly, so she asked.

"Teacher," she said, "is the Father in heaven my Father in heaven, too?"

"Why, of course, Vidda," the teacher said.

"Well—well, will I have some freckles now?"

"Will you have some what?"

"Will I have some freckles?"

The teacher looked at Vidda's face and smiled.

"No, I don't believe you will ever have freckles, child," she said. "You are one of the lucky folk that never have them. I envy you your skin, child."

But Vidda did not care if her skin was envied or not.

"I didn't know I could have a Father in heaven unless I had freckles," she said.

"You queer, queer child!" the teacher said. "Of course you have a Father in heaven. Freckles have nothing whatever to do with that."

"Then I'm decent now, ain't I?" Vidda asked.

"You're a queer little darling, whatever else you are," said the teacher, and she bent and kissed her.

SOME days, no matter which wire wall she was looking through, haunched down on her heels, Vidda saw a father come home, but she did not envy any Gregg or any Towners. Sometimes the Gregg father grasped the freckled boy and shook him angrily, making him cry, and sometimes the Towners father spoke quite cruelly to the Towners girls and they looked ashamed and hurt, but Vidda's Father never spoke crossly to her. Of course, on other days, it was nice to have a father come home, and Vidda's Father never came home.

"My Father He art in heaven," Vidda told herself. "He can't be coming home all the time," and she watched the ants and the beetles, and went to the board gate when her grandmother came home, and welcomed her. She was not at all unhappy that she had no freckles. She was quite content now that she had a Father in heaven, and then—one day—she found a great new happiness.

"And so Jesus," the teacher explained to the Sunday-school class, "was the Son of the Father in heaven, and He was born a little baby in a stable."

This was indeed amazing news to Vidda. When she heard it, her heart jumped like some happy animal shut up in her breast. She remembered a card the teacher had given her—oh, long ago; a year ago!—a card all lovely colors and gold, with sheep and cattle and a mother bending over a baby. She could hardly wait until Sunday-school was over; she wanted to be at home and to find the card; she was almost sure where it was, only she had never thought much of it before—but now! She found it where she had thought it might be, under the hair-ribbons in the drawer of her bureau.

"Oh!" she cried, and kissed it again and again. "My own little brother Jesus! My own dear little baby brother Jesus!"

She looked at the card a long while. There had never been a dearer little baby brother, she was sure. He was curled up so cunning in the straw of the manger, with His head raised a little and His knees drawn up and so chubby and pink. Even the cows and sheep had to look at him! And the Mother bending over him so tenderly! Vidda studied the face of the good Joseph carefully. She had never noticed the man in the picture before, but now he had great interest for her. She looked long, sitting on her heels, at the kindly bearded face, and liked it.

"He must be my Father in heaven," she whispered. "My Father in heaven and my dear little brother Jesus!" and she put the card carefully under her hair-ribbons.

Every day, and often both morning and evening, she took out the card and looked at it. She felt that she would like to ask her mother about it, but each day her mother seemed to be straighter and more stern of face, and one did not dare ask her questions.

AND so the Autumn waned into Winter. The ants no longer climbed the bark of the apple-tree, the flowers wilted under the frost, the leaves fell and the bare vines of the honeysuckle clung leafless to the wire walls, and in coat and mittens Vidda played her games in the snow. It was not as pleasant as the Summer, but Vidda was happy, because why should one be unhappy when one had a Father in heaven and a sweet baby brother Jesus? She no longer peered, sitting on her heels, into the adjacent yards, for the honeysuckle no longer hid her—and it was thus she came to look through the wire wall at the rear of the yard.

She had never looked through this wire wall, but now it was as if she was seeing a new world and one different from any she had yet seen. She looked into a yard that was strewn with wisps of straw and hay and littered with wagons and sleds, and she saw quite clearly the stable of which she had never been able to see but the roof. She saw an open door and through the opening she saw hay in a manger!

As she leaned forward she let her hand rest on the wire mesh of the wire wall and it crumbled under her

AND ON EARTH—PEACE

By ZONA GALE

A wild night in the hills when the dead came back

ACROSS a mile of flat white pasture land one light shone. Bertha Millet saw the light, and hated it.

Snowflakes were whirling against the glass. There was wind. Her first night in the hills was to be a night of storm. She only hoped that Carl would come with her mail and her supplies before the storm grew fierce. This would be his last trip up into the hills before Christmas—only three days away.

Christmas! The first Christmas day that she had ever spent alone.

How they were talking down in the valley. "Bart Millet's wife—yes, the flighty one. No wonder he went off with another woman—a sober, quiet, industrious creature, who understood all that he had put up with from Bertha, who was no housekeeper. A man wanted a housekeeper. Anyway, Bart went off with Jane Graham—and Jane was thirty, and a respectable widow with a girl of eight. She must have pitied him—poor Bart. Not that Bart had done right—nobody was defending him—but to understand weakness was your Christian duty. As for that Bertha Millet, with her independence and her high ways, who could understand her? Who wanted to understand her?"

She could hear their voices as if they were rising from the valley. She listened for the sound of Carl's car coming up the Glen Road, but all that she heard was the roll of voices. She knew what else they said:

"And Bart Millet's death," they were saying, "was Bertha's fault and nobody else's. Because, if Bart hadn't gone off with Jane, he wouldn't have hired out to the lumber camp—and the raft wouldn't have drowned him. Bertha killed him just as much as if she'd pushed him off the raft into the river. And there was poor Jane, trying to keep her girl Anne off in school—and all that scandal!"

It was Jane's light which Bertha could see across the valley. Bertha stood at the window watching for Carl and thinking how perfectly neat the room was where that far lamp was set—the room which she herself had never kept in order. But Bertha had left that house on the day after Bart had gone with Jane. She had lived on in the town in a boarding-house. And now Jane's light shone across the mile of flat pasture into Bertha's new abode—a small place, set up in the hills, the farm which had belonged to Bertha's father.

For the last fortnight, Bertha knew, that light had shone on some one besides Jane Graham-Millet. It had been shining on Anne, Jane's daughter, home for the Christmas holidays, home for the first time since Jane had gone away with Bart. Bertha wondered if she knew. The valley and the village wondered if she knew.

"Poor little thing! Of course she couldn't understand like the rest of us. She'll think her mother was just plain bad. She won't know what kind of a cook Bertha was. Mebbe some of us could kind of explain, like her mother can't——"

BERTHA had no doubt that somebody had explained. The wind was strong and it beat upon the house. Bertha had on the kettle to make coffee for Carl—she could make good coffee, even if the valley hadn't liked her way of serving vegetables and salads instead of pastry and cake. And Carl could eat at any moment of the day or night. She had loved him from his little boyhood when he had run over from the adjoining farm and asked her to tell him a story. She had opened to him a new world, and he admired her increasingly when his two years of college were done and he had come back to manage his father's farm. He was her one link with the world now, she told herself. But they must have it understood that on a night like this he must not drive up with her provisions. Snow was falling so that she could hardly see Jane's light. She turned away, and the wind was so strong that she did not hear the sound of Carl's car until he had driven into her yard.

BERTHA WONDERED WHAT THERE IS TO SIGNAL THAT TWO PEOPLE ARE IN LOVE

She flung open the door and he came in, and the room filled with the odor of the cold and with flying snow. The lamp flickered, the fire leaped in the draft, and his presence seemed to wake the air.

"I'm a sight, Mrs. Millet," he said; "the snow came in even through the windshield. I'd just drop the ba ket and go, only——"

He looked at her and at the window, caked with the flakes.

"Take off your coat," she cried. "I'll have some coffee in ten minutes—but it'll only take me a second!"

They laughed, as they always had laughed together. She was actually bustling—the valley would not have believed it of her—getting ready his supper.

He did not take off his coat, but made ineffectual dabs with his cap, beating away the snow. His face was brown and firm, his blond hair was thick.

"I can't," he said. "I must get straight on to-night——"

She turned. "Why my dear! I haven't seen you—I haven't seen anybody since you were here last week. Of course," she caught herself, "I don't want to see anybody—but I do want to see you——"

"I know," he said, "I've no end of stuff I want to talk with you, but to-night——"

He turned his look to the window.

"You shouldn't have come," she told him. "I've been anxious for two hours. That road—Carl, don't you think that you should stay here?"

Again his look went to the window, where the lights of his car made the flakes sparkle.

"I could get on all right myself," he said, "only——"

"What, Carl?"

"I've got some one with me."

"Well, then—of course you'll both stay here!"

"I don't think you'd like that, Mrs. Millet. I don't think——"

She made a wide gesture; her face was not even curious.

"I shall not mind, whoever it is." Her thought caught, as on some visible obstacle. "Perhaps you mean it's somebody who wouldn't care about putting up with me?"

"It's not that—why, she's up here with me, isn't she? But you—I wish it wasn't such a devilish night!"

"If she wouldn't care," said Bertha lightly, "that's all. Don't keep her out there freezing to death, Carl!"

"My dear," he said, "it's Anne—Anne Graham."

For an instant her look was blank.

"Jane Graham's daughter," he had to add.

"Does she know?" Bertha asked only.

"Oh, everything!"

"Then she shares the valley's idea that I deserved what I got. She won't want——"

"Don't be absurd. But are you sure——"

"Don't you be absurd," she said, and took down another cup.

His look was his answer. Then she heard him:

"Anne! Mrs. Millet wants us both to stay."

ANNE and Bertha met as two beings having no wrongs and no relatives.

"Mrs. Millet," Anne said, "I do wish we weren't making you so much trouble! I was paralyzed at that Glen Road coming up. I daren't think of it going down——"

"I shouldn't have forgiven either of you," Bertha said.

Anne slipped out of her fur coat—she had on no hat and she wore nothing over her shoes. She was in a black gown, but her bright short hair and her high color heightened the room like light.

"Come and have some coffee," said Bertha, and the doubtful moment was at an end.

A happy party they were that night

That Carl's path and Anne's were irrevocably crossed became at once evident to Bertha. She wondered what there is to signal that two people are in love. Not words nor looks—but they flowed together, mind and mood, like an hour and a clock—and no more to be said about it. Love, among many things, was what they were for, and they assumed it. And yet, Bertha saw, there was not less romance, but more! Carl and Anne were not, in the manner of older lovers, disconcerted. Merely, they were exquisitely, jubilantly at home.

When, therefore, Carl said, "Anne, shall we tell her?" Bertha said: "Do tell me the particulars—the plans! Everything else I see for myself."

"But do we look," cried Anne gaily, "as if we are eloping?"

"Eloping?" Bertha repeated. "No, I shouldn't have thought of your eloping."

"Well," said Carl contentedly, "that's just what we are doing."

"But, my dears," said Bertha, perplexed, "why on earth should you elope? I don't see the necessity."

"We—we want to pull out," explained Carl, not with entire clarity.

"Aren't you coming back?"

"We may," Anne answered, with something like decision. "We don't know."

"That's just the point," said Carl. "We don't want to have to know. We want to be free—perfectly free."

"But I don't understand," said Bertha. "Surely if you were married here, you could do just as you liked about staying."

Anne's eyes met Carl's quite calmly.

"But," said Anne, "we don't want to be married. We—we don't believe in marriage."

"ALL RIGHT," BART SAID SUDDENLY. "I TELL YOU BOTH I WAS A FOOL TO LEAVE BERTHA. I LOVE HER YET"

FACED thus abruptly with the open phrasing of a secret thought which had sometimes come to her through the years of her own marriage to Bart Millet, Bertha's first stricken amazement was more at this barefaced announcement than at the opinion itself.

Yet instinctively she cried: "Oh, my dears, not that!"

She felt her mistake in their instant withdrawal. They said no more, seeming oddly to feel that the burden of proof lay upon her.

"I shouldn't have thought," she accused them feebly, "that you'd stand for anything so unoriginal."

They laughed. This was better. Carl, who, she saw, had wistfully expected of her something like this, cried:

"I knew you wouldn't give us the same old line we'd have had to take from the others!"

"But," she said quickly, "you see, I agree with the others, for all that."

Into his face leaped a passionate accusation.

"Mrs. Millet," he cried, "you don't! You can't! All the silly rot they talk—all the hypocrisy. You know better!"

She was silent. Who better than she knew their hypocrisy?

"To go against marriage—" she began, and glanced at Anne and faltered.

"Don't mind me," said Anne briskly. "Mother gave you a rotten deal—nobody feels that more than I do. I'm frightfully ashamed of it. Of course this isn't in the least like that."

"Every case seems special," Bertha heard herself saying. This had come so suddenly—she had no time to sort her certainties!

Carl leaned toward her.

"Look here," he said winningly, "be yourself with us—please! Don't feel you have to stand up for society. We both know—everybody knows—what you've been through—I mean, the whole ten years before—before you got free. You—you were a wonder, and marriage simply crucified you. You were a brick—but—it—it killed some of you, all the same. Don't stand up for that sort of thing—to us!"

She looked in their wise young faces—so strangely wise on such youthful shoulders. Why, neither was twenty-three yet! And yet here they were, aware of truths. . . . She caught herself on that. Truths? Yes, there was truth in this that Carl had just been saying. She knew, the village knew, the valley knew—and other villages and other valleys, the world around. There were marriages that were crucifixions, that killed some of the souls of those who had taken marriage vows. But oh, couldn't they see the others——

"Would you go through it again?" Carl demanded. "I mean, as you did before——"

"No," she said, "indeed I would not. And certainly, if I had only known that—" she cried to them, "but you two! Don't you know that you love each other?" She tried to add gaily: "I know it—I can see that you do!"

"We love each other too much to bind each other," said Carl solemnly.

Bertha turned to Anne. "Tell me," she said, "you don't mind my asking: Do you feel this—or is it only because he——"

Anne laughed. "I wouldn't believe any thing just because Carl did," she said. "I rather like to smash what he believes—in a nice way. No, I've believed this way for ages. Ever since I was in high school I've meant never to be married."

"Your mother," said Bertha. "Forgive me—she acted on that principle of freedom—do you think that she——"

"Oh, but she wasn't free!" cried Anne. "She was bound — or she ought to have been—by your bondage. That's it—when you're once inside, you can never get free yourself or let anybody else be free. Of course mother has suffered fearfully. That's one of the things that makes me know marriage is so wrong. It—it binds everybody, perfectly miserably. And Carl and I——"

HE PUT out his hand and she took it. Their look was the look of two who would never let each other go.

"You're bound already," said Bertha. "Don't you see that?"

They looked startled, but they quickly rallied however.

"For just as long as we want to be," said Anne stoutly.

"And how do you know that you will both cease to want to be at the same time?"

"I wouldn't want anything Anne didn't want," said Carl.

"Wouldn't you?" Bertha looked at him intently. "Wouldn't you love her at this minute, whether she loved you or not? If you wouldn't, I wouldn't give much for your love!"

"Well, of course—" Carl began feebly.

"And you'd love him," she said to Anne, "even if he didn't love you—yet."

"Well, we're not selfish pigs," Carl maintained. "If the other one wanted to be free, neither one of us could bear to hold on, no matter how much we wanted to!"

"You'd be taking your pain that way, then, instead of any other."

"It would be a nobler pain, though," said Anne quickly.

"And there'd be the children," Bertha said.

"Oh, well, that," said Carl decidedly, "was exploded ages ago. Nothing could be worse for children than to be brought up with a father and mother behaving like cats and dogs."

Bertha looked at the two lovely, serene faces.

"Do you two honestly," she asked gravely, "expect to behave like cats and dogs?"

"We might," Carl contended placidly. "Lots of nice folks do."

"Speak for yourself," cried Anne. "I'm not nice."

Carl said remorsefully: "We didn't mean to worry you with this. We came by the Glen Road only because I wanted to leave your things——"

Bertha turned to them with a startled look.

"You don't mean that you're leaving now!" she cried.

"Sure!" said Carl. "We're on our way!"

"Three days before Christmas! You're not leaving home now!"

Anne had a definite air of trying to be casual. "Carl spoke about that," she said, "but we pay too much attention to Christmas, don't you think?"

"Anyway, the elements are on your side," said Carl.

THERE WAS NO SOUND BUT WAGNER'S VOICE, ALTERNATING WITH THE MELODY HIS OWN FINGERS PLAYED. MADLON, WATCHING THE KING'S FACE, SAW TEARS IN HIS EYES

MOON-ROSE

A royal love story By DIXIE WILLSON

An enchanting woman enters the life of the mad king of Bavaria and of immortal Richard Wagner

DO WE measure time by love? Do we measure life by dreams? Eternity by hope? Strength by sorrow?

I heard some one coming along the wet sand—the scuffing of flat shoes. I smelled the odor of fish and wet clothes.

At sunset time on Starnberger Lake the air is low and hushed. It catches every sound like a hollow box.

"It is a woman coming," I said. I could tell by the weight of the feet, the whish of a skirt.

There on that lake in Bavaria sunset is like uncut jewels—broken pieces of light spilled on gray velvet. But it is like something else too. It is like a soul fighting to live. It clings to the sky—it fastens on the mountain snow—it dips into the trees—while all the time the lake washing shawm-shawm-shawm against the shore is sucking that throbbing color under the water till you feel in your own body the quiver of its sinking. Even the squawking forest birds hush with the flaming silence of the struggle.

I looked around at the woman coming down the shore. Heavy shoes, thick dress, a little shawl. Her face was smooth and flushed like a girl's, her eyes bright wide blue, her skin had no wrinkles, but her hair blowing out from a handkerchief tied over her head was gray like gray sea mist, and her shoulders were bent. I couldn't tell if she was old or young. She carried a rod with a sagging line and fish on a string of gut.

"Do you know anywhere that I could eat to-night?" I asked her in German.

She looked at me thoughtfully.

"You can come with me," she said, "if fish is enough."

Amid blushing the wedding cake was cut

I went along after her—along the shore while darkness came down and the hills crowded in. By the time we came to where she lived yellow squares of lights in windows were shining in the black trees. It was a little low house we came to, with so many flowers blooming they seemed tripping all over each other. It surprized me—the quaint loveliness of it—but it was when I caught the musk of a wonderful fragrance that I suddenly knew this was no fishwoman's place—a fragrance I had found but once in my life before! The fragrance of a moon rose—wax-white petals opening only after nightfall—the scent of spice of the Orient—the rarest rose in the world! And here, by the door of this wooden little house, the whiteness of a moon rose came up to me.

She watched me while I stopped so suddenly and looked and looked at it.

"I have never seen but one," I said at last. "There is one in a garden in Switzerland."

"Yes, there is one in Switzerland," she said.

What woman was this! I began to watch her as curiously as I had stared at that rose.

She lit a lamp inside the house and gave me a carpet chair. I took it and sat in the door, where I could watch that rose in the dark, watch the woman too.

"You live here all alone?" I asked her.

"Oh, no!" She smiled, putting the fish in a bucket. "I'll show you."

She pushed open an inside door and there in little beds little children were sleeping—nine tousled heads! She went in, tucked here and there, and came out again.

"I have lived here sixty years," she said.

"Sixty years," I repeated, surprized. "But you are not sixty!"

"I am over eighty," she told me.

I stared at that woman—smooth face, eyes almost beautiful. She was changing her heavy shoes for cloth ones, combing her hair that the wind had ruffled. She put on a blue apron with white lace and began to cook fish and coffee. I wondered why she had told me that. I knew she couldn't think I'd believe it To stop looking at her, I picked up a prayer-book—old, with broken corners and yellow edges. It had a queer gold clasp—a beautiful thing. I didn't think of it holding any secrets, but when I unfastened the clasp the pages fell open to a letter—ivory paper, scrawled writing. I held it to the light.

"Why," I said, amazed, "isn't this the seal of the royal house of Bavaria?"

"Yes," she said, breaking a brown-bread loaf in two pieces. "It is."

"But where did you get such a letter—signed with the royal seal?" I asked, incredulous.

"It was written to me once," she said, her voice so low that I bent my head to hear. "What it says has kept me from growing old—has made every day a privilege instead of only hours that pass."

Do we measure time by love?

"WHEN I DIE, I SHALL SOMEHOW CAUSE TO GROW IN WAGNER'S GARDEN A MOON ROSE, AS AN ANSWER TO HIS QUESTION"

MADLON LUTZ was too pretty to carry ale in any bier keller for any soldiers, but the place was her father's, so there she was just the same.

Possart would sit all alone in a corner and watch her going from one table to another—white hands—yellow braids of hair—red lips—talking to everybody, laughing with all of them.

Old red-faced Lutz thought Possart would be a fine match for Madlon. One night he leaned into his face telling what meals she could cook, till Possart was ready never to look at her again. He didn't love her or have any notion to. It amused him to watch her get big handsome soldiers ogling after her, because it was his way to amuse himself with others instead of himself.

Every man who saw Madlon did love her, though. Possart seemed to be the only exception. Some of them had wives—all of them had sweethearts—but Madlon saw to it they should want her anyway. The more business her father had, the more money for her. Very good! But Possart—she knew he didn't love her.

"Not him," she laughed, "but he would if I wanted him to! When I find a rich one like Possart—I'll have him!"

She didn't care how she did it.

"What I want I'll have!" she said. "Why shouldn't I?"

One night, as Possart was leaving the place, he all of a sudden had a whim for something. He asked Madlon to get her cloak and come out with him. Her father, sopping up spilled beer from the floor, heard him ask her.

"Sure, go on," the old man told her in his coarse voice.

It was cool and warm and sweet in the parks of Munich. Madlon in a scarlet cloak, her face lovely as fleeting moonlight, rode out with the great impresario of the Royal Opera in his open carriage. People bowed as they passed. The footman sat up smartly.

"I hope you're in no hurry to get back to the soldiers," Possart said, watching her face against the dark carriage. "How old are you?"

She told him seventeen.

"Well," he laughed, "seventeen is old enough to say what it wants or doesn't. Take us to the Opera House," he told the coachman.

It was a week of no opera. The great white doors were closed, shadows hanging over them like strips of velvet. Possart took Madlon out of the carriage and through a small door placed where no one could see it. It swung open for them, closed behind them, and there was a hallway with thick scarlet rugs, walls of tapestry, swinging lamps casting little pointed rays of light, and at the end of the hall a wide door and a stairway. Possart took Madlon to the door. "Wait in here for me," he said.

She stood there and watched Possart go up-stairs, then she went into that room.

Mr. Weller kept the domestics in a state of hilarity

By a carved table a man was standing. Tall—dressed in evening clothes—young—a handsome face.

"Where did Possart go?" he asked. Then he smiled. "What are you staring at?"

Half the men in Munich had made love to Madlon Lutz — soldiers splendid in uniform, rich men, poor men—but there was something here in this man she had never felt before but once, when one night Possart had brought a stranger to the bier keller, and suddenly now she saw that this was the one Possart had brought.

She dropped her cloak on a chair and went across to him—short black skirt—cheap gay little apron.

"You were in my father's place with Possart once," she said. "I served you. I was staring because for a minute I thought you looked like the King of Bavaria!"

"You served me once, yes. I remember," he said. "I was there with Possart—and I am the King of Bavaria!"

POSSART came in. The king had Madlon's hand in his. She was smiling openly into his face.

"Your — your Majesty!" Possart said shortly.

It was known that Possart and King Ludwig were friends. It was known that Ludwig went out incognito on odd errands with Possart.

The impresario stared for a moment, then recovered himself, and bowed.

"Your Majesty," he said, "I intrude to say your performance of the opera is ready."

He threw open a double door at his right hand. Beyond was the great auditorium, empty and in darkness but for hidden lights striking across the velvet curtain of the stage. The king turned from Madlon abruptly, strode past Possart and, as the door closed after him, a crash sounded of the orchestra beginning an opera played for the king and the king alone.

The dreaming king! Caught by passion for beauty like a fly in a web! Music, painting, drama, the marvel of a peacock's feathers, jewels, a bee in the pollen of a rose, a flower unfolding, eyes and mind feasting on beauty and melody till his little country was like a ship with a captain seeking fantom islands instead of a port. Night after night at midnight, opera for only himself. No one else. Not even Possart.

Possart, left alone now in the carved room with Madlon, tapped his fingers on the table and smiled at her oddly. Possart's game had been exactly this—to put Madlon before the king, who, in all his demanding of every beauty in the world, never yet felt interest in a woman. Possart had long been curious about it. His spice in life was making puppets of people, and it had suddenly occurred to him to wonder if maybe he might even make a puppet of the king!

"If your father were here," Possart said, "he would tell the king how well you can cook."

Madlon fluted her apron.

"If you could have left him to me a minute," she pouted, "I could have told him myself. A king is only—so much a king!"

She waggled a finger at Possart. Lovely lips—laughing eyes.

"But if you think you played a joke," she said, "you're wrong. If you thought the presence of the king would alarm me to foolishness, the truth is you have only saved me the trouble of picking out for myself the man I shall

BEAUTY and the BEAST

The story of a girl who could buy what she wanted

By KATHLEEN NORRIS

Author of "Certain People of Importance", "The Black Flemings", etc.

JANE RICHIE DAVENPORT, in her own private yacht, the Dixie Belle, chaperoned by an aunt and uncle, with an old playmate, Gordon Raleigh, as captain, and an English lord and French comte on board, is cruising foreign waters. Janey, twenty-six, with everything in the world that money can buy, is contemplating purchasing one more property—a foreign title. She considers marriage with either of the two noblemen, her guests on board. They put in at Palermo, where an eligible Sicilian prince excites her ambition. A nouveau-riche American girl, Dollie Saterlee, has already spoken for him, but with little difficulty Janey cuts her out. The prince invites the American group for a week-end visit to his ancient Castle Tramontare, far in the wild mountains of the island.

PART TWO

"YOU'RE in love with love, Janey—that's what's the matter with you!" Gordon Raleigh told her, the night before the visit to Prince Carlos di Rampolli's castle at Tramontare.

It was a brilliant, warm evening, and the gardens of the Villa Igiea were bathed in bright moonlight.

The young people had all been dancing; the music floated out here into the perfumed night.

Pellegrino's dark shoulder stood boldly outlined against a sky of clear, luminous blue. At the mountain's foot the tiny eye of the lighthouse winked and was gone, and winked again.

Janey had a fringed Spanish shawl drawn loosely about her bare shoulders; a band of glittering brilliants bound her rippling hair. Her brown eyes were mysteriously sweet.

"Gordy dear, don't crab!" she pleaded youthfully.

"I'm not crabbing! But I don't see why we can't all just have fun," the man said sulkily, "without all this rot about Saracens and Roman dominion!"

"Gordy, you know back home," Janey began patiently, "doesn't everybody like to go back to the Civil War, and the Colonial grants, and all that? Look at Aunt Nell and the George Washington berry-bowl? Why, there have been blackberry-seeds drying in that bowl for a hundred and forty years, just because the president came and had dinner with my ancestors! And look at Lafayette roses—there wasn't a girl in the South that didn't ask the marquis to plant a rose in her garden! And look at the high-boys and the spinning-wheels and the samplers—aren't those all kept just to show that the family has hung together for generations and amounts to something—that it isn't just a case of Gipsies straggling along the highways? Your own great-grandmother danced at Jefferson's inaugural—now, didn't she?"

The fiddlers began the dance in real earnest

"I'll be darned," Gordon interposed in a boyish and rebellious voice, "if I can see what that has to do with your carrying on with a lot of wops! You've got buckets of money—and that's all they care about!"

"Now, Gordon," Janey said, facing him with flashing eyes, "that's not true! There are piles of Americans who come here and can't get it—the real nobility won't have anything to do with them! Count Fraternelli says——"

"Oh, bush-wah!" Gordon remarked expressively, if obscurely.

"Bush-wah nothing. I know you don't like him, but that's no reason that you should be so unjust. He knows our ambassador well——"

"He says he does."

"Gordy, aren't you ashamed?"

"How did you meet him?" Gordon burst out, with a readiness that suggested a long-stored resentment. "Through the Saterlees, whom nobody thinks much of at home, who are title-chasers anyway! Mrs. Saterlee sends her card over to their table—that's a nice thing for an American woman to do! I know darned well that if you tried it at home, you'd get all you bargained for! But it's you, Janey, you falling for the whole box of tricks," Gordon went on disgustedly, "that's what gets me. You're beginning to talk as if all that counted in life was to have a few Saracens and moats in the family!"

"I don't know what makes you think that you can talk to me like this, Gordon Raleigh!" Janey burst out angrily. "You know, when I asked you to be captain of the yacht," Janey continued cuttingly, "I didn't expect you to chaperon me in the bargain!"

She was a little ashamed of herself as she said it, and more than a little frightened as he walked on at her side in silence, his handsome head a little bent, the moonlight full upon his scowling face.

"You've got the right to say that, Janey," he presently said, in a mild, thoughtful voice.

"Gordy," she began, "I didn't mean——"

She paused. The man turned toward her with a glimpse of a smile. "You didn't say anything that I haven't felt, since we started, a thousand times!" he said. "It's lots of fun, running the Dixie Belle; it's been what I always wanted to do—and not having any folks left—and being awfully fond of you folks——"

THE simple home phraseology, the halting boyish speech gave her a homesick pang, and she interrupted quickly:

"Don't talk that way! You make me feel so ashamed!"

"No, but running a rich girl's yacht isn't a man-sized job," her companion continued, more as if thinking aloud than addressing her. "Men ought to work, in this world—real men— I'm going home after this trip is over, and I'm going to settle down to law, and run for the senate, and maybe be vice-president, and get to be such an American that beside me the eagle'll look like one of the Hohenzollerns! There isn't any other country in the world—I'm for it——"

"In the meanwhile," Janey cut short his encomiums quietly, "you've not given me any good reason why, when you and Lord Rountrey start to Tunis to-morrow, I shouldn't go with the Saterlees and Count Rossi and Prince di Rampolli to the Villa Tramontare."

"The Villa what?"

"Tramontare. It means sunset."

"And they'd all like to have the son set around on your money for the rest of his life, Janey!" Gordon said shamelessly.

"Oh, Gordon, that's rotten!" But she laughed her old joyous laugh as she said it, and, suddenly, in the darkness of the garden the man put his arms about her and said, in a trembling voice:

"Ah, Janey, don't marry a wop! Not if he's the king himself! You're an American. Wait for me—and come on down and help run congress—and have a camp in the mountains——"

"Gordon! You're losing the little mind you have—" She disengaged herself, her fingers gripping his as she stood close beside him. Both were laughing excitedly. "And I thought you'd stopped liking me!" Janey breathed.

"No, I'll never stop liking you as long as I live!" he said tensely.

"Now, come on back, Gordy, come on back!" Janey cried, childishly tugging at his hand, "and let's not be silly! I promise you I'll not marry Carlos di Rampolli unless I'm so crazy about him that I can't see straight, and you promise not to talk silly any more——"

"You've never been in love, Janey!" He had delayed her just outside the ballroom door.

"Why, I'm in love now!" the girl answered, breathless from her hurry. "Gogo!" she added, catching at his wrist. And he saw her eyes glitter with laughter. "Gogo" had been a code word in that happy childhood of theirs long ago. It meant, "I don't mean it!"

The man remembered it and laughed in relief.

"You darling—it isn't Rountrey, then?"

"It isn't anybody, I tell you! I'm just having fun!"

She felt the better for the firm assertion, and determined that the note of to-morrow's expedition should be simple friendliness and comradeship, nothing more.

They were to start at eight, in two big, comfortable motor-cars, chartered by Count Fraternelli. That is, the arrangements had been commenced duly by Fraternelli, but quite innocently they had been completed by Mrs. Stanley. Engaging the cars, it had occurred to the count to ask the older lady to inspect them, and while inspecting them, at the bureau of tourist accommodation in the city, Mrs. Stanley had thoughtfully paid for their hire.

"Six hundred lire," she had explained afterward to Janey. "It seems to mean so little to us, less than thirty dollars. But it might seriously embarrass him."

"Oh, yes, why not?" Janey had answered, with a comfortable casualness she did not quite feel. And she had added, with an apparent indifference, "Aunt Nell, don't—I wouldn't—mention that to Uncle Stan or Gordon, will you?"

"Oh, certainly not," Mrs. Stanley had agreed, with a significant look.

Early as was their start, the Dixie Belle had made an earlier one for the little expedition to Tunis, and her white-bellied sails passed the windows of the Villa just as the April sun was rising. Janey and Dolly and Vivienne ran down to the stone wall in the strip of garden that was especially their own and waved gaily in farewell. The light struck the three slim figures, bobbed of head, with loose silk kimonos over their pajamas, and aureoled them in gold against the dark green garden, and the Dixie

JANEY WAITED, TREMBLING, PANTING, HER EYES FIXED UPON THE DOOR

Belle bobbed her ensign in a jaunty "Good morning!"

The Saterlees' ground-floor apartments adjoined those of the Stanley party, and this morning the girls ran back and forth between the opened rooms in boarding-school fashion, calling questions from the doorways, debating over sweaters and hats. Coffee was served in Janey's big drawing-room that had recently been occupied by a dethroned king, and the Saterlees perched on the arms of the opposite armchair and gnawed at rolls, all of them chattering like parrots.

"Listen, Janey, I'm just going to coat myself with cold-cream; it's a hundred and sixteen miles, and it'll be dirtier than death on a pale horse!" said Vivienne. "Look at Aunt Robbie goggle at me!" she added.

"You-alls talk mighty free about deff on a pale hoss, an' voodoo charms," muttered Aunt Robbie, folding a white dress carefully.

"Aunt Robbie has a hunch about this visit. She says that if we once get up there among the Zulus we'll never get back!" Janey contributed, laughing.

"Zulus? Are there Zulus in Sicily, Aunt Robbie?" Dolly Saterlee, carried away by the infectious gaiety of the hour, asked with something of her old spirit.

"Zulus or Booloos," the old woman mumbled, "I know you-alls ain' goin' to git away f'um 'um alive!"

"NO SUCH luck!" Janey said. "It's just a simple party into perfectly civilized mountains. Only the Mafia—" Janey predicted. This cryptic and potent word appeared to cover all sorts of mysteries.

"The Mafia, at least, are not mountain bandits, Janey!" Dolly protested. "They're—somebody was telling m'ma—they're so powerful that every one is afraid of them, even the police won't touch them—they work together, in fact!—and the big merchants and business men actually pay the Mafia to protect them. They'll follow any one they're down on to the ends of the earth, and what makes it awful is that nobody knows quite who belongs——"

"Maybe the prince is one!" said Janey with relish.

"Oh, Janey, don't!"

"Well, I don't know why not! Anyway, I'd rather have them with me than against me."

"Janey Davenport, you make my flesh creep! I don't honestly think you girls ought to go!" Mrs. Saterlee said nervously, her bandaged foot elevated to a chair-seat, her steaming coffee-cup lifted high in both plump hands. "There were two Americans killed the other day— Mrs. Stanley said she knew one of their wives——"

"That was in Albania!" Vivienne reminded her. "You're not frightened, are you, Mrs. Stanley?" she demanded cheerfully.

"Well, I probably would be if you girls would tell me the truth for five minutes!" Mrs. Stanley returned discontentedly. "I thought of this as a little trip into the country with a couple of boys. Just as if we went up to the Carrolls', or the Ashes', at home. Now, for all I can see, we're running our heads straight into a noose——"

"It's twenty minutes past eight!" Janey interrupted unceremoniously. "Run and see if the motor-cars have come, Giuseppe! He doesn't understand me. I automobili, I automobili! Si, Si. Va bene!"

"Janey, I think it's remarkable how easily you've picked it up," Dolly said enthusiastically. "You speak Italian as well as I do! Come on. Good-by, mother darling. Aunt Robbie's going to take wonderful care of you! This is Wednesday morning—we'll be back Friday night or, at latest, Saturday night."

All the young ladies kissed Mr. Pickwick

THE three girls in gales of mirth went through the early-morning halls, Mrs. Stanley somewhat reluctantly following them. Two comfortable open cars, in which their bags were already being stored, were waiting at the door. Comte Lebretagne was already established in the front seat of one car, di Rampolli, Rossi and Fraternelli were standing watching the porters.

Suddenly, in the midst of hand-kissing and greetings, a most unwelcome wave of misgiving smote Janey. She wondered dismally why she had felt so light-hearted seeing the two American men of her party and the one Englishman depart for Africa's coast a few hours ago. These Latins, with all their graces, seemed utter strangers. Roman domination and the Saracens appeared suddenly to have gone flat. The eagerness with which she and the Saterlees had accepted this ridiculous invitation, and had swept aside all the difficulties attending it, made her face burn.

Fraternelli had arranged it that Dolly and Vivienne were nicely placed with Lebretagne in the car already occupied by a driver and Count Rossi. This left Prince di Rampolli and himself for Janey and her aunt in the other car, and so quickly, so smoothly were all the seats apportioned that Janey found the party actually starting before she appreciated the adroitness of the THOUGH Christmas is celebrated as a one-day festival now, it formerly was of longer duration. In old English times the celebration of Christmas was a firmly established custom and began December 16, lasting until January 6. The end was called Twelfth Night because the Wise Men traveled twelve nights after they saw the Star in the East before they came to the stable where they presented their gifts to the Christ Child. These gifts were symbolical—gold for a king, frankincense for a high priest and myrrh for the great physician—all three of which the Child was destined to become.

On Twelfth Night all festivities came to an end. A three-pronged candle was burned and what remained of the main stem was preserved as a safeguard against evil spirits. In some places each member of the family chose one of these candles to represent himself and watched the burning with interest, as the length of time the candle burned was supposed to indicate his own span of years. Although we have put away most of these old-time superstitions, there remains the belief that the weather of each day between Christmas and Twelfth Night is indicative of the weather for each corresponding month of the new year.

There are a great many legends connected with Christmas. One is told of Ansgarius, who went forth to preach of the White Christ to the vikings of the North. Three messengers were sent along with him—Faith, Hope, Love—to find and light the first Christmas tree. They searched for one that should be as high as Hope, as wide as Love, and should have the Sign of the Cross on every bough. The balsam fir seemed best to meet these requirements and so was chosen, and to this day the balsam fir is the favorite Christmas tree.

The decorations of the tree have significance also. The star generally used at the top represents the Star in the East, which guided the shepherds. The candles (or other lights) placed on the tree symbolize the light that Christ brought into the world. Fruits hung upon the tree indicate the new life that was brought to the people of the earth.

Holly, so universally used as a Christmas decoration, is thought by some to recall the Crown of Thorns and the drops of blood; but further back holly was used as a symbol of rejoicing at pagan festivals, and this is the more interesting meaning, as the glossy green leaves and bright red berries are as cheery as the happy day is meant to be and generally has been.

ANSGARIUS, PREACHING TO THE VIKINGS, LIGHTED THE FIRST CHRISTMAS TREE

ALONG with the legends concerning the origin of the Christmas festival and the meaning of the decorations, there are many dishes which are continually connected with the holiday, and many recipes for Christmas goodies have been handed down from mother to daughter and daughter-in-law for generations. Some of them retain their old-time flavor and form, though many have become modernized through necessity.

English plum pudding is a favorite and has changed but little. It was always anointed with brandy, which was set afire and so brought in state to the table. There are those who claim that this does not add a bit to the flavor. However, the blazing brandy must have served to keep the pudding warm during its journey from the kitchen to the "board" in the main hall, for in the early days houses were great, comfortless places according to our modern ideas.

Boar's head was a dish of medieval times, and it had to be the head of a wild boar. Prepared, placed on a gold or silver platter, garnished with slices of spiced beef, rosemary and bay, it was brought into the dining-hall with much ceremony.

A more simple dish and one more easily reproduced to-day is that of furmety, or frumenty, which was made of hulled wheat boiled in milk. To us this may seem a very simple dish for such a great occasion, but even as late as 1750 only the well-to-do used wheat for bread, and that only at Christmas time.

Stuffed peacock was another ancient Christmas dish. It was carefully skinned, then when roasted redressed in its fine feathers and sent to the table. It was considered too noble a bird to be carved by a servant, so the Queen of Beauty, or the lady guest of honor, was given the privilege. Sometimes the peacock was made into a great pie and this decorated with the head and tail only.

In our own country in more modern times we have had some Christmas cakes that have given great reputation to their makers. Martha Washington always served fruit-cake and gingerbread royal at Mount Vernon during the holiday time, and other wives of presidents served equally famous cakes.

Many of our Christmassy dishes have come to us from our English ancestors, for it was in old England that our present celebration of the day had its firmest hold.

The best-known description of a Christmas dinner is that of Bob Cratchet's, in which Dickens has established the goose for all time as the Christmas bird.

"CHRISTMAS was at hand, in all his bluff and hearty honesty; it was the season of hospitality, merriment and open-heartedness. The old year was preparing, like an ancient philosopher, to call his friends around him, and amidst gaiety and revelry, to pass gently and calmly away."

"There was an air of cheerfulness abroad that the clearest Summer air and the brightest Summer sun might have endeavored to diffuse in vain. . . . The poulterers' shops were wide open, the fruiterers were radiant with joy. There were great, pot-bellied baskets of chestnuts, there were ruddy, brown-faced Spanish onions, there were apples and pears and bunches of grapes, there were piles of filberts, mossy and brown, recalling in their fragrance ancient walks among the woods and pleasant shufflings ankle-deep through withered leaves, and there were oranges and fruits. . . The blended scents of tea and coffee were grateful to the nose, the raisins were fine and plentiful, the candied fruits so caked and spotted with molten sugar as to make the coldest onlookers feel faint and subsequently bilious . . . everything good to eat was in its Christmas dress."

CHARLES DICKENS had two great hobbies: one was Christmas; the other was food. His hobby for food was not merely that of the man who likes to eat. It was the hobby of the man who appreciates cooking and has an artistic feeling for the nuances of the art. When Dickens wrote about food, raw, prepared or in the act of being consumed, he was unctious, imaginative, whimsical, sympathetic and, withal, technical, as no one else has been, before or since. When he described a dinner, it was not as a literary man with a feeling for food, but as a professional and enthusiastic chef with a literary tendency. This is especially true of his wonderful Christmas dinners, of which there are over two dozen scattered through his works.

The good-tempered old fellow went down the slide

One of these, which is the least known of them, compresses a whole world of fun, humanity and culinary knowledge in a few lines of print. It is in "The Uncommercial Traveler," and occurs when that worthy entertains the six poor men at a Christmas dinner. Do you remember it?

The food has been purchased at a hotel and is being carried to the place where it is awaited.

"Myself, with the Pitcher.
Ben, with Beer.
Inattentive boy with plates.
Inattentive boy with hot plates.
THE TURKEY.
Female carrying sauces to be heated on the Spot.
THE BEEF.
Volunteer Hostler from Hotel Grinning
And Rendering No Assistance."

To complete the picture there was "a man waiting in the hotel to dash into the kitchen, seize the hot plum-pudding and the mince pies and speed with them to their destination."

He loved food, did this man who had been a starved, sad little boy, just such a little boy as David Copperfield, who spent many a weary, longing hour looking into cook-shop windows, where "glimpses were to be caught of hot meats, vegetables and puddings, roast leg of pork bursting with tears of sage and onion in a bed of gravy, of an unctious piece of roast beef and blisterous Yorkshire pudding, bubbling hot, of baked potatoes glued together by their own richness, of a stuffed fillet of veal, of ham in a perspiration, of a truss or so of boiled greens—" No one could write that who had not known the famished stirring of hunger, or who had not the instinct of the food artist. To many of his readers this

The Nursery School

"The world is mine"

A new type of Kindergarten

By ARNOLD GESELL, M.D.
Director of the Yale Psycho-Clinic, Yale University

THE nursery school is something new on the educational map. It is arousing an extraordinary interest among mothers and even among normal school and college students, to say nothing of less numerous fathers who have heard about it. Is it all a passing enthusiasm? Probably not. For there is much solid professional, as well as popular, interest. Educators, psychologists, psychiatrists interested in mental hygiene, pediatricians interested in healthy bodily development, social workers, public health and home economics leaders, medical clinics and departments of universities have begun to lend active support to this growing educational movement in behalf of children of preschool age. Each year sees more such schools.

THE "JUNGLE GYM" HELPS THESE YOUNGSTERS TO BUILD STURDY BODIES

The nursery school is a new type of kindergarten which receives children as young as two years old. It is used for training parents as well as children. In England nursery schools are being supported by public taxes. In Highland Park, Detroit, Michigan, a nursery school has just been established as part of the public school system. So we may say that the nursery school is officially on the map. It has become a question of public policy. What should be done about it? The final answer will be in the hands of parents, who, of course, may always claim a first and a last word in the training of their young children.

What is a nursery school like? For a picture we may visit the nursery school at Ruggles Street, Boston. Miss Abigail Eliot, who received part of her training in England, is director. This is one of the most representative nursery schools in this country and one of the oldest, though it was first opened in 1922.

It is located in an old-fashioned, roomy house, with a yard, trees and a garden. There are swings, a slide and a jungle gym for the climbers, wheelbarrows and kiddie-kars for the runabouts, a sand-box for diggers. Inside are a piano and a fireplace. There are low tables, low blackboards, low wash-stands, low shelves, low hooks. It is evident that everything is planned for young children, who outnumber the adults to the extent of about fifty to four. These children are from two to five years of age.

There is an agreeable informal atmosphere about this "school." In some ways it all seems like a magnified home. Again it is also somewhat like a kindergarten, though most of the children are of prekindergarten age. It does not resemble the kind of primary school which maintains quiet, stiff discipline, and which keeps its children in rectangular rows. Least of all is it like a day nursery where children are "parked" simply to be minded. Usually one or two mothers are present assisting, observing and learning more about the art of child-care through participation in the program. It soon becomes clear that although the children have a good deal of freedom, there is a hygienic program planned to promote their physical and mental development.

DOES HE FIB?

What do you do when you find your little one telling "stories"? What do you do about other faults—if he, or she, must be coaxed to eat, or won't go to bed without protest?

These leaflets will help you correct the faults and develop the right characteristics: TEACHING YOUR CHILD TO BE TRUTHFUL, by Angelo Patri (enclose just two cents to cover postage) and THE DEVELOPMENT OF PERSONALITY, by Dr. Arnold Gesell, ten cents.

Toys, too, may be helpful or harmful. Our leaflet, HELPS FOR SANTA CLAUS, gives suitable gifts for children of all ages. Two cents for return postage will bring it to you. Address requests to The Happy Child Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York.

THE daily routine of the nursery school can best be summarized in Miss Eliot's own words:

"What do our twenty-five little children, two and three years old, do here? The school is open five days a week. The children come between 8:30 and 9:30 in the morning and during that hour play at will with toys taken from certain closets. During this hour, too, a nurse from the Community Health Association inspects the children for signs of contagious disease, talks with the mothers who bring them and helps us teach them health habits, one of which is gargling with salt and water. It is fun for a child to gargle when he can try to make more noise than the boy next to him.

"Then comes the morning circle, followed by free musical expression, songs, rhythm work and dramatic games. At ten o'clock after washing hands, we sit down at table for the morning lunch of milk and crackers. The children help arrange the table, bring flowers for it, give out paper napkins, pass the crackers, clear away afterward and wash the cups.

HOW TO TAKE CARE OF HIMSELF IS PART OF THE BABY'S SCHOOL TRAINING

"When this is done there comes a period of comparatively quiet occupations on tables or floor. From a closet containing a large variety of things such as Montessori apparatus, kindergarten gifts, chalk, plasticine, hammers, nails and so forth, each child chooses for himself his own occupation material. He may change his material if he wishes, after having made a real effort to use it. At the end of approximately three-quarters of an hour these things are put away by the children, and the toys which ensure physical activity are brought out. For another period they run and shout, jump and laugh, climb and play to their hearts' content.

"Just before dinner at twelve the children wash their faces and hands and comb their hair. It is a pleasure and pride to do these things successfully for oneself. It is extremely unpleasant to have them done to one. Again at dinner the children help arrange the table, pass the dishes, clear away afterward, wipe off the table and sweep up the crums on the floor.

"Then after they have brushed their teeth, they clamber upstairs, take off their shoes, crawl into their blanket-bags and go to sleep. The nap is from one to three o'clock. They wake bright and happy, put on their shoes and go shouting down-stairs for a final romp before going home at four.

A NEW SCHOLAR TAKING HIS ENTRANCE EXAMINATION—FROM THE DOCTOR

"This is an all-day nursery-school program. It does not follow that a nursery school must keep its children all day. The mothers of this particular school are most of them now under the necessity of working for wages to maintain a home; but in Cambridge, Massachusetts, in an economically more favorable district, there is a nursery school which is conducted on the half-day basis. The Winsor Club Nursery School of Boston also keeps its children (ages three to six years) only from nine to twelve o'clock. This is an important difference, and we shall say more about it when we consider the mothers' part in this whole matter of preschool education.

Whether on a half- or full-day session the nursery-school program makes no false distinction betwee

HOW "MUSTACHE" NAMED A STREET

ONE fine May morning two hundred and fifty-five years ago Nicolas Peers and his dear old friend Jean Tilman walked merrily together along the high-road to Brussels. Beside them walked some one else, some one called Mustache, some one with a shaggy coat and four legs and a tail—in fact, the smartest dog in all Belgium, or so Peers said.

That was how the quarrel started. For the more Peers boasted of Mustache the more Tilman teased.

"Why," cried Peers, "that dog has even found things for me a long time after I had lost them."

Tilman laughed. "Of course, Mustache hid them himself and then brought them back."

Mustache pricked up his ears but said nothing, for he was busy chasing sparrows from their dust baths in the road.

"I'll bet you!" cried Peers. "I'll bet you I can throw something under that oak tree—a piece of money, say—and then send Mustache back from the next town, and he'll catch up with us in Brussels and drop the money at my feet."

"What? What?" cried old Tilman, stopping in the road and laughing long and loud. "You're joking. What will you bet?"

"To-morrow's dinner!"

"Agreed!" said Tilman, and they shook hands.

Peers took a coin from his pocket, cut three cross-marks on it with his penknife, and threw it into the grass under the oak tree. Mustache said nothing.

At the next village, Peers stopped, gave Mustache a coin to sniff, pointed back down the road, patted him and said: "Go and get it!"

Mustache sniffed, looked at his master, wagged his tail, trotted a few steps, buried his nose in the dust and was off at a gallop. The two old friends went their way, still arguing.

Some hours later another traveler on the road to Brussels had stopped to eat his lunch under the shade of the oak tree. Suddenly he spied something shining.

"Good luck! A half-crown!" thought he, and pocketed the coin.

It was just at that moment that Mustache came panting down the road. He stopped and sniffed a long time through the grass around the oak tree.

The traveler patted him, wondering if he had lost his master.

But when he rose to go, Mustache followed him.

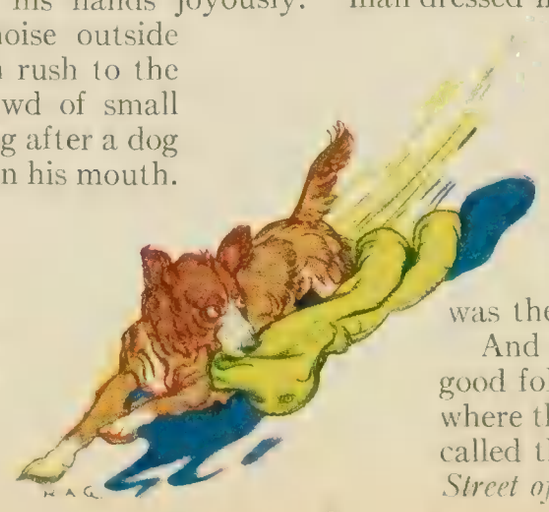
"Well," thought the man, quite pleased, "this dog likes me."

At the next village the dog was still following. At Brussels, there he was. When the traveler entered the inn where he was to spend the night, there was Mustache. When he went upstairs to his room, Mustache was at his heels. When he undressed and laid his clothes across a chair, Mustache gave a leap, curled up on the trousers and went to sleep.

"This dog has adopted me," thought the traveler. "He is already guarding the money in my pockets." And he went to bed, greatly pleased.

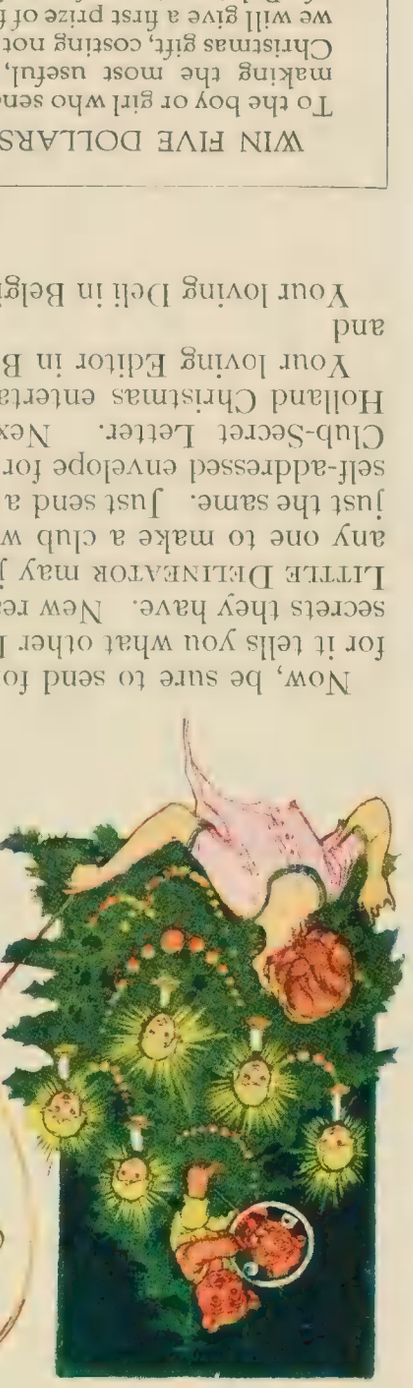
ALL evening Tilman teased his old friend, and the next morning at breakfast he was still laughing.

"So you really believed that animal of yours would bring back your half-crown? Why, Mustache is probably safe at home with your wife by this time. Ha, my friend, what a fine dinner you'll give me to-night!" And Tilman rubbed his hands joyously.

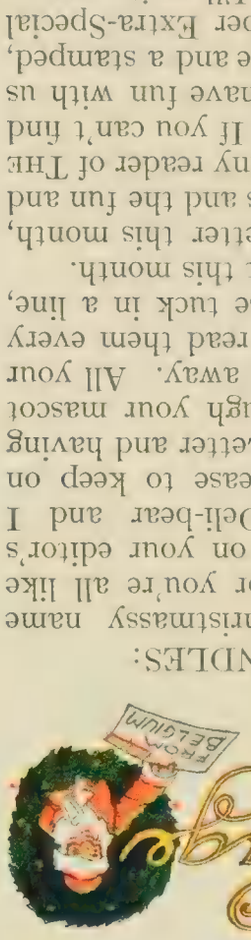


Suddenly a noise outside made them both rush to the window. A crowd of small boys ran shouting after a dog with something in his mouth. The dog ran past like lightning. Then there came a scratch and a whine, and Mustache burst into the room. Dropping a pair of trousers at their feet, he stood wagging his tail and barking for joy. His puzzled master turned the trousers over and over.

"Ha! Ha!" roared Tilman. "You asked your dog to fetch you a half-crown and he brings you a pair of trousers! I told you he was a thief!"



But Peers was shaking the trousers. Several pieces of money rolled out. Mustache pounced on one and carried it to his master. Peers looked, started, and handed it to Tilman without a word. It was the half-crown they had left under the oak tree!



"But what—why—how?" they began, when another noise drew them to the window again. This time it was a man dressed in a barrel—the traveler, hunting for his trousers and his dog! While his back was turned that morning, Mustache had slipped out. It was the teasing Tilman who paid for the dinner that night, and Mustache was the guest of honor.

And that is why, or so say the good folk of Brussels, the street where the traveler lodged is still called the rue de la Braie, or the Street of the Trousers.

DEAR CHRISTMAS CANDLES:

I'm calling you a Christmassy name instead of a Belgian one, for you're all like thousands of bright candles on your editor's foreign Christmas tree. Deli-bear and I want to beg you please, please to keep on sending for the Club-Secret Letter and having meetings and fun, even though your mascot and your president are so far away. All your letters are sent to me and I read them every one. When you write, please tuck in a line, too, telling what you like best this month.

Now, be sure to send for the Extra-Special Club-Secret Letter this month, for it tells you what other D. C. members do at their meetings and the fun and secrets they have. New readers, come join our Deli-Club. Any reader of THE LITTLE DELINEATOR may join, whether a subscriber or not. If you can't find any one to make a club with you, you may join alone and have fun with us just the same. Just send a two-cent stamp for your Deli-badge and a stamped, self-addressed envelope for an answer telling your Club Laws and your December Extra-Special WIN FIVE DOLLARS CHRISTMAS MONEY!

To the boy or girl who sends the most practical idea for making the most useful, unusual and easy-to-make Christmas gift, costing not more than twenty-five cents, we will give a first prize of five dollars and a second prize of a Belgian picture framed. If two or more contestants tie, each will receive the prize tied for. Contest closes December 20, 1925. Address Christmas Gift Contest, THE LITTLE DELINEATOR, New York, N. Y. The TOMBOY COUNTESS HADN'T you supposed that Countesses were pale and haughty ladies with long black velvet trains and perhaps even a little gold crown? Well, so had I—until I visited a real Belgian Countess in Brussels.

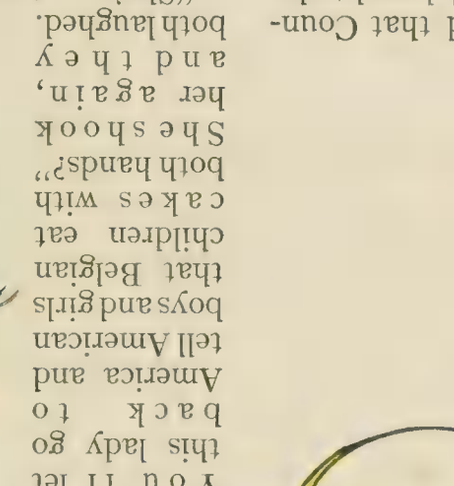
A solemn young footman in livery opened her huge high front door and led me up a big staircase into a big room—just like the fairy tales. But where were the velvet train and the haughty stare?

For this Countess shook hands like an old friend, and she was plump and rosy-cheeked, with soft white hair, and when she smiled she might have been somebody's own mother or grandmother. Sure enough, she was both. For she told me proudly that her first grandchild was five days old, and while one tall, sweet daughter served tea to us, here came a tousled little girl with a friendly grin and her arms full of Belgian books to show the American lady.

So we talked, over tea and home-made cookies, when suddenly the Countess took her little girl by both shoulders and shook her till the crums fell from the cake she was munching like a mouse. "What?" she cried, pretending to be fearfully angry. "What? You'll let this lady go back to America and tell American boys and girls that Belgian children eat cakes with both hands?" She shook her again, and they both laughed.

"She's a tomboy," explained her mother, and she guessed to myself: "Aha! You used to be one yourself!"

What's more—but sh-h! don't tell on her, for, after all, she is a Countess—what's more, she's a tomboy still!



"Come," she was saying, taking her little girl by the hand. "Let's show Miss Eager some of our Belgian games. Oak tree! I'm the oak tree—I must stay in one place," and the Big Tomboy took hold of the doorknob and stood very quiet, while the Little Tomboy tripped and tipped gleefully about her. Suddenly the oak tree plunged forward, the Little Tomboy squealed, but she was caught in the oak tree's other hand.

So now the Countess tipped and tripped about the little oak tree, and just as she was making a beautiful dodge, the door opened, and she tumbled bang! into the surprised and solemn young footman. He didn't smile—footmen never do—but the Big Tomboy and the Little Tomboy and I all laughed. Oh, it was a very laugh-y party, and it grew cozier and cozier.

Over another cup of tea the Countess began telling me about holidays in Belgium. Children there get presents on New Year's Day as well as on Christmas. But before that comes St. Thomas's Day, on the twenty-first, when children have the right to lock parents into a room until they have promised whatever is asked.

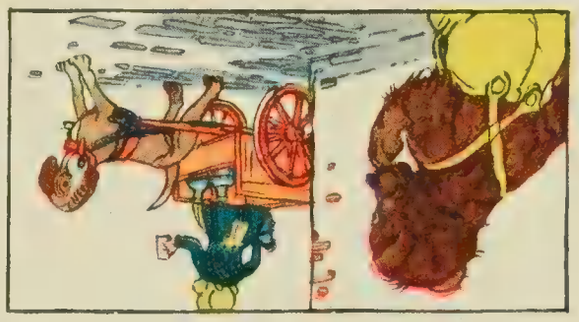
"And of course," said the Countess, "as my husband must go to Parliament, and I have many engagements, we always say yes." Her Little Tomboy grinned and munched another cookie.

Four days after Christmas comes a day still more wonderful for children, "The Day of the Innocents" (when Herod, you remember in the Bible, ordered all the babies killed in the hope of killing the little Christ-child). That day children are masters of the house. They even order the dinner, and father and mother may only beg them humbly please to have a little meat and potatoes too, instead of only ice-cream and cake and sweets. A child sits at the head of the table, and the grown-ups wear bibs and must wait till they're spoken to and ask politely for second helpings! And if the Count forgets and puts his elbows on the table, or the Countess spills jam on her bib, off they are ordered to stand in the corner till they learn better manners, if you please!

Then there's Twelfth Night, when whoever finds the sugared almond in the cake is King or Queen.

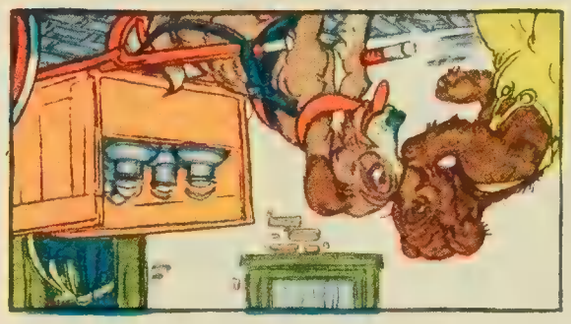
Then there's Mi-Carême (pronounced Mee Kah-rem), the middle day of Lent before Easter, when father or uncle or big brother is missing after dinner, and the Count of Mi-Carême appears in a silk coat and knee breeches and buckled shoes and a wig, and gives presents to children.

Around Easter-time, shop-windows are all gay with bells—cake bells and candy bells, big bells and little bells. For it's not a bunny who brings Easter eggs in Belgium, but the church bells. A month before Easter all the steeples are silent, and people say: "The bells have gone to Rome." But suddenly on Palm Sunday—crash, ding-dong, clang!—every bell peals and sings again and people say: "The bells are back from Rome. What did they bring? They brought eggs!"



"And sure enough," said the Countess, "there are Easter eggs in every home!"

Do you wonder that your editor could have sat there and drunk twenty cups of tea, listening to such tales of fun from such a pleasant lady? But time came to go, and as we shook hands good-by I wished the ocean were not so wide, and when the solemn young footman had bowed me out of the door again, I thought:



"That was a real Countess. I must tell American children about her."

And so I have.

DELI-BEAR'S CHRISTMAS IN BELGIUM

1—A milk-man lady with a cart our Deli spies—and more,
A Belgian doggie like a horse, who trots from door to doorl

2—So Deli-bear, chuck-chuckling full of Christmas fun and cheer,
Whispers a merry Christmas plan in Belgian doggie's ear.

3—Whizz! off they fly, a double team. The milk-man lady shrieks,
While bang! the milk-cans rattle and the wagon groans and squeaks.

4—Now puzzled doggie pants and waits, his tongue out in surprise,
As Deli rushes in and back with pans of every size.

5—Sniff! sniff! the orphan puppies race from every nook and street
To lap and lick and lick and lap at Deli's Christmas treat.

6—Down swoops the milk-man lady, out of breath and red and mad,
But Deli pays for all the milk—and everybody's glad!

ONE child is the shoemaker and sits on the ground pretending to mend shoes, while the "ladies fair" walk around him in a circle. The shoemaker begins: "My ladies fair, where do you go to-day?" and they answer, "Shoemaker man, a-walking if we may," and so on. As the ladies sing, "Just catch her if you can!" they break the circle and run, chased by the shoemaker, who tries to catch one of them. The lady who is caught becomes the shoemaker.

Gifts that will gladden the Household

All can be made by the careful

By MRS. CHARLES BRADLEY SANDERS

Director, Department of House Decoration and Home Building

HOW CAN YOU WAIT

to start those nimble fingers at their task of fashioning these little articles? It's fun to make them and fun to give them because every one welcomes decorative and practical objects like these. The wait will not be long if you sit right down and address an envelope to Mrs. Charles Bradley Sanders, Department of House Decoration, Butterick Building, New York, and enclose a two-cent stamp for return postage. Post-haste will come to you a sheet containing complete and simple directions for making the boxes, the tray, the lamp-shades and all the others on this page. And you can finish them in plenty of time for Santa Claus

Paints in a variety of well-selected colors will quite transform an empty jar, a ten-cent tin candlestick and a vase of graceful shape into these desirable gifts

Cut-out stencils are novel and effectively shed a softly tinted amber light through a thin silk, pasted to the back of a lamp-shade and candle shields

The above convenient whisk-broom holder was made from an ordinary butchers' straw cuff and a piece of cretonne. Cut the cretonne in two pieces and glue flat to the cuff, allowing about an inch for the overlap. A piece of gold cord for a hanger is tacked firmly to the top of the cuff. Gold braid glued over both top and bottom edges finishes the holder

Cover a large iron hook with colored sealing-wax, add a silk cord of a contrasting color and tassels and—behold a unique curtain tie-back!

The octagonal flower-vase is no more nor less than an empty pickle-jar whose alternate sides were painted red and white. A spray of seasonal berries is outlined in the contrasting shade on each side. A new lacquer paint was used on this and on the vase at the top of this page

The pasteboard shoe-box is slashed at the end and across the top, and is covered inside and out with gay cretonne, which is glued firmly and smoothly into place. Strips of adhesive hold the flap together beneath the cretonne covering, and green sateen binds the rim of the top. A set of boxes such as this, including dress-boxes and hat-boxes, developed in individual color schemes would prove an ornament to any closet shelf

Muffin-tins are changed by an application of black and gold paint into a practical tray. The little fringed crape napkins are each of a different pastel shade

To make the charming lamp-shade cut a piece of manila wrapping-paper to fit both top and sides of the frame, and glue in place. A strip of black paper finishes the top and bottom of the shade, and a black painted band outlines the print. The surface of the shade is painted with amber sealing-wax dissolved in alcohol, imparting a lovely transparency

Any telephone-index covered with natural linen and decorated with a painted spray of blossoms may hang conveniently by means of a jade bracelet and a tassel

Merry Christmas with Silhouettes

Christmas cards easily made by the novice

By FRANK R. OTTE

SHADES of all past Christmases! Pushing up to crowded store counters, pawing and peering for suitable Christmas cards, finding nothing exactly right—but paying a mighty big price even so for what you get!

Do you know that you can make, in your own home, for little cost and with great enjoyment, holiday cards which are exactly right because they are you yourself? So forget the shades of past struggles at Christmas time, and with a camera and a little time and care make instead merry little shades of your own personality to send to your friends.

In these sadly mechanical times, when everything is being standardized, from radio parts to marriage laws, the Christmas card at least has made a break for freedom. More and more people are turning away from formal engraved greetings and making their own individual ones. Perhaps no way of doing this is easier or more successful than using silhouettes.

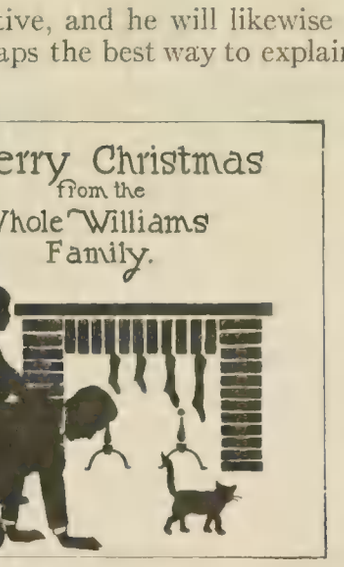
Although there are three principal methods of making camera silhouettes—by flashlight, electric light and daylight—the general technique is the same. With flashlight, or any artificial light, night-time is best. For your "location" select two rooms with an open doorway between, and entirely cover the doorway with a sheet of white cloth, drawn tight. Place the flashlight back of the sheet, as in figure 2. Put your subject before the screen at right angles to the camera, and be sure that the face is in full profile. If you use more than two figures, it is well to arrange them so that the imaginary line will fall between them.

In using a flash-sheet it is best to utilize a flash-pan attached to a tripod, and elevate the tripod so that the flash-sheet is about four and a half feet from the floor. For the average size camera—that is, one which takes a film 3¼ x4¼ or 5 x 4, the No. 3 flash-sheet is recommended; the No. 2 for smaller sizes. In following these directions F. 8 or U. S. 4 is the proper diaphragm opening.

Your floor, of course, will not reflect sufficient light to give sharp relief or detail to the feet. So if you want them to show, place a sheet on the floor to act as a reflector. Or better yet—take a couple of leaves from your dining-room table and with the aid of a few books make a small platform raised about six inches from the floor. Cover this platform with white cloth or white oil-cloth stretched tightly and tacked under the boards. If you slightly tilt the board so that it inclines toward the sheeted doorway, your results will be even better. This, however, is not entirely necessary, for with a small brush and some photographic opaque paint you can paint out any undesirable background after the film is developed. There is just one other thing to remember; dark clothes are more suitable for silhouette work than those which are white or light colored.

When you are ready to take the picture, turn out all the lights, press the bulb and step back of the curtain and ignite the flash-sheet. Then close the shutter; that's all there is to it. Quite simple too!



If you do not care to use flash-sheets, silhouettes by electric light are quite as simple. The diagram for set-up is the same as shown in figure 2, the only difference being a 500-watt electric bulb substituted for the flash-sheet. For temporary use, this may be plugged in to any house circuit and will not blow a fuse, providing too many other lights are not burning at the same time.

Using a hat-box as a reflector has proved to be a good idea. Figure 1 shows how this is done. The only difference between flashlight and electric light is in exposure. The 500-watt lamp requires an exposure from two to five seconds if really good results are to be obtained.

THE daylight method of taking silhouettes is quite as simple. The general principles of the diagram are the same, only instead of a sheeted doorway use a window or glass-paneled door. As usual, cut off all light in the room except that which comes through the door or window in which you are going to pose your subject. A window should be selected which admits an abundance of unobstructed light; either a snapshot or a "bulb" will give you the proper exposure. In a similar manner you can utilize a garage by covering the doorway with a sheet against which the sun is shining.

When you send your films to be printed, it is well to attach a note explaining that they are silhouettes. Then your finisher will develop so as to obtain a "contrasty" negative, and he will likewise use a "contrasty" paper. Perhaps the best way to explain the rest of the processes necessary for the making of a silhouette Christmas card is to describe the technique of my own family greeting, a fairly elaborate one, shown in the lower right-hand corner of this page. I made the picture of my wife holding the candle over the table by the flashlight method. The holly wreath was a paper one, which was purchased for ten cents and pinned to the sheet just above the table. The window is a daylight silhouette with the frame drawn on the prints with a ruler, pen and India ink. "Me and my pipe" were made by the electric light process. To get the baby, then a wiggler only twenty-two months old, was something of a trick as, of course, she wouldn't stand still. But by using the electric light method and waiting for an appropriate moment we succeeded after only four exposures. When the separate negatives were printed, we cut out each of the silhouettes assembled and pasted them on a white cardboard. Next the greeting copy was hand-printed, a crayon touched up the floor, and at small cost the printer made the halftone, from which any number of cards were printed. A little red opaque paint added to the letters, the candle tip and the holly wreath after the printing proved most effective, and took a very short time to do, only adding to the fun. The cost of the cards was little more than you would pay for ordinary ones in a store. I doubt if you could have a greeting simpler to make than the silhouette or have more fun in the making, and the enthusiasm of your friends will assure you every bit of it was worth while.

THANK YOU!

You can say it in so many ways. After you get delightful gifts with clever little greetings is your "thank you" as individual and suitable?

We have a leaflet on "thank you" notes and gifts—correct and novel notes to write after Christmas, after weddings and birthdays, after illness with its attentions and gifts from friends, and notes and attractive little gifts for your week-end or vacation hostess.

Just write Mrs. Kimberly, Etiquette Editor, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, and ask for her "Thank You!" leaflet. Slip in a two-cent stamp for postage, please!

New fabrics make their Holiday bow

By MRS. CHARLES BRADLEY SANDERS

Over a three-fold screen frame, first painted black, was carefully tacked a black, red and buff reversible casement cloth. A coat of shellac over the material makes it taut, and the whole rivals a leather or paper screen

GREETINGS

We wanted something brand new to give you as a gift suggestion this year. So we scoured around and gathered the very latest designs in the very latest fabrics. We made them up into these unusually attractive articles, and will gladly send you more explicit directions for their making. Just drop me a note, enclosing a two-cent stamp for postage, and address it to the House Decoration Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

With best wishes for your success with these gifts and for a very Merry Christmas, Leontine F. Sanders.

For the guest-room, why not a new desk-set? Cretonne—of the sunfast variety—was used to develop this one; also for the candle-shield, the fluted lamp-shade, a waste-basket and curtain tie-backs

Buff duvetyn tied and dipped in a dye-bath of green was used for the table-runner and for the cover of the guest-book, while black-and-white cretonne roses, cut from a tub-fast print, were pasted and then shellacked to the cover of a black wooden jewel-box

Something very new—an American version of a famous French fabric, toile de jouy, sun-fast and washable—used in this instance as a roller-shade. It comes in a soft red, amethyst, green and blue, and if you look closely you will find that it depicts the old Quincy mansion, the Landing of the Pilgrims, an early log cabin and the covered wagon

Glued to an undecorated parchment lamp-shade, the black-and-white pheasant motifs of a print material stand out like a black-and-white drawing. This motif is repeated in the material used for the oval sofa-cushion in the chair

Left: Say "Merry Christmas" to the nursery with a floor-pad and cushion covered with bright yellow and blue waterproof chintz. These are both bound with a soft-blue grosgrain ribbon

Right: Just a common market-basket, but with its handle enameled black, and covered inside and outside with a gay blue, black and orange striped waterproof material, holds a generous assortment of milady's cherished tools

Following a Star

By CELIA CAROLINE COLE

ONCE upon a time, in the days long gone by, three men traveled across a desert, bearing gifts. Gently and steadily they journeyed, led by a star. Whenever their hearts grew faint and doubtful within them, they looked at their star. "Surely," they reasoned, "this star does not mock us. Surely it was sent, a guide from God, to lead us to some fulfilment." And so at last they came to where the young Child lay.

One can always tell the face that is following a star. And just as, in that time long ago, only three men out of all the world saw and followed and found, just so now only one face, perhaps, in a million will have the light in it of the follower of a star.

Yet for every single face in the world there is a guiding star to be seen and trusted in and followed.

Your star may be the aim to live and die spaciously, nobly, an aristocrat in the eyes of God; it may be service, a desire not to gain anything for yourself but to give, give, give; it may be a longing to get the spiritual meaning out of everything you meet in life (that's a wonderful star, casting such a radiance all around that not even the drunkard on the street is a drunkard to you but a bewildered part of yourself trying to find its way up and out); or your star may be a hunger for beauty, material beauty all around you, in your home, in your clothes, in your life, in yourself—not such a dim little star, that, either; my star may be just a twinkly little star of wanting to own a white house with green blinds and straight little pine-trees on either side of the door, and a pink tulle frock, and thick, upcurling lashes.

But whatever your star is, follow it; it is leading you to where lies understanding, new-born. Whenever doubts and hurry assail you, look at your star; your face will take on the light of it, and your life conform to its outline if only you will travel as did the three Wise Men, faithfully, steadily, without haste, bearing gifts of love. For love is like understanding, the more you give, the more you will have to lay at the feet of fulfilment.

Last year a beauty salon here in New York had a famous London author write its Christmas booklet. All he could think of in connection with Christmas and women was strain, and being a sincere person, he wrote of the destructiveness of Christmas on women's beauty and grace and charm, the strain of traveling blindly and heavily, burdened with "traps," the strain of trying to keep up under our false sense of Christmas. If woman forgets the quiet radiant journey of the Wise Men to the Manger, the why we have Christmas, the reason we give, who will remember?

If I were a writer on philosophy, I should say to you in this Christmas month, "Simplify; take time to be. Beautify; let the touch of you make all things more beautiful. Believe; follow the highest in you and let no lesser thing divert you." But I am a writer of beauty, and so I say, "Simplify; take time to be. Beautify; let the touch of you make all things more beautiful. Believe; follow the highest in you and let no lesser thing divert you."

RUNNING down my Christmas list I find the unknown names of you who read me. I have spread over the dressing-table and the chairs and the bed those things I have collected to give away—trinkety little things when you think of what one might give—but the best, in my judgment, of all those things a woman needs to make herself as glowing as a star, as mysterious as the moon, and as desirable as sunlight.

First—oh yes, here's something, not wrapped up, no holly, no red ribbon, just to be stuffed into the stocking hastily, a bit embarrassedly, so that we won't think of it as sentimental and throw it out in the snow. It's this bit of advice: Be yourself, a person, with a spiritual, mental and physical color all your own, not just a member of a sex or of a family. Don't let anything or anybody take that away from you. Take time to tend yourself, so that you expand into beauty and spread it around you, like the glow from a lamp. You can. You were not created primarily by a father and mother, but by Eternal Beauty expressing itself in terms of beauty. Be alone enough to remind yourself that the secret of life is to attain beauty—beauty of living. Walk alone, a little out there, beyond time and space, in glorious, bright dreams. Dreaming can bring immortal facts into view by removing the dust that dims them. Read, ponder, dream and then let it flow into action. You are a lamp; don't turn up so high that you flame out of the chimney and waste; don't turn down so low that you will go out; but shine like a star, steadily, guidingly—mysterious, high and beautiful—a woman——

There, that's in. Now for those gifts, all tied with merry red and green ribbons, actual things you see, touch, smell.

A cream. All my beauty-writer life I have tried to find a cream that would, like a perfect woman, contain all the virtues. It must cleanse, nourish and have enough astringent quality to refine the texture, so that when you want to go gipsying across the world you can take only one jar instead of three. I have found it. And never again in this world shall I be parted from it. It's name is yours for the asking.

SOULIÉ'S SKETCHES SENT FROM THE BUTTERICK PARIS ESTABLISHMENT SHOW THE NEW FLARES AND PRINCESS LINES IN COATS AND FROCKS

Martial et Armand are largely responsible for the new back look of the present fashions, having sponsored the bustle and the back flare. Here the flare movement appears in both the black crêpe satin frock and the slip of pink Georgette which shows itself at the neck and back and in the wide sleeves

An excellent example of what might be called the straight fall of the flare is to be seen in Patou's frock of beige crêpe. In addition to the all-around flare of the skirt there are flare panels and flare wings, flare frills on the sleeves and a shoulder flare in back. The French term "ampleur évasée" should be "ampleur évasive," for the general effect is slim and straight till one moves and the flares begin to fly

Renée puts the flare at the sides of a coat of Russian green kashacotta trimmed with silk braid, many buttons and "labrador" fur. The color, the shawl collar, the "patch" use of fur and the princess silhouette are distinctly new. The general effect is more elaborate, due to the seaming and the trimming, and represents an important step toward more feminine dress

Poiret the Magnificent makes a characteristic use of apricot-colored moire silk shot with gold and trimmed with gold braid on brown velvet bands edged with fox. The coat has the new princess silhouette with an all-around flare

Molyneux uses ocean-green panne velvet lined with steel metal cloth for an evening wrap trimmed with steel lace and mongolie (goat skin) fur. A shirred flare is placed at the back and the uneven hem is carried higher at the front

Among the new materials of great elegance that are used this Winter—chenille brocades, metal brocades, metal laces and velvet—none is more important than velvet. Lucien Lelong uses powder-blue velvet over a velvet slip of rose mauve embroidered with rhinestones, pearls, gold beads, silver and green. The skirt flares at the side

The dress is smart for ladies 36 to 52 bust.

6478—A fly-away tie-collar of velvet ribbon, a circular flounce attached in scalloped outline and the smart long close sleeve of the season give distinction to this slip-over frock. It may be made of satin Canton, plain satin, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, satin faille, etc., or use chiffon velvet with metallic ribbon, etc. The dress fits closely at the hipline. Lower edge 2⅞ yards.

36 bust requires 3⅜ yards 39-inch crêpe satin (flounce cut crosswise).

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6449—10961—Embroidery adds its charm to a frock charming in itself. For it has the lovely princess line, so new and smart. Work the embroidery in color. Inverted plaits are placed at each side front and side back of this slip-over dress. Use worsteds, cashmere, serge, wool crêpe, light-weight kasha, camel's-hair twills, etc., with contrasting satin or crêpe de Chine; or use crêpe satin, etc. Lower edge with plaits drawn out 2⅛ yards.

36 bust requires 2⅝ yards 54-inch twill.

The princess dress is for ladies 32 to 48 bust.

THE swing of the flare sets the Winter mode in motion. The new styles are swayed by flared princess lines, flounces, godets and the many and varied circular cuts. Loose panels do their bit, also, for lightness and animation. Placed at the back, front, side or all around, the flare ever appears in new and unexpected outlines and in new styles—as, for instance, on two-piece frocks that combine the straight line of a long blouse with the flared line of a circular, flounced slip. The straight styles continue smart for wools, especially the heavier and rougher ones, and novelty weaves; also for the bordered and half-and-half materials, brocades, etc., where the design is the thing and unbroken lines are required for it.

THE SMART FLARED AND STRAIGHT COATS, FROCKS AND TINY SUITS OF YOUTH

6462—This delightful dress scallops the hem of its full straight skirt attached to a basque at a slightly low waistline. It slips on over the head. Use radium, crêpe de Chine, etc., with contrasting hand-made flowers, or velvet with metallic fabric, etc.

12 years requires 2⅛ yards 35-inch taffeta.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6450—It's smart to be able to button one's straight trousers to the waist through tabs in front. Use dimity with linen, poplin, etc., trousers; or madras or crêpe de Chine with silk poplin or shantung, etc.

4 years requires 1⅜ yards 32-inch dimity and ⅞ yard 32-inch chambray.

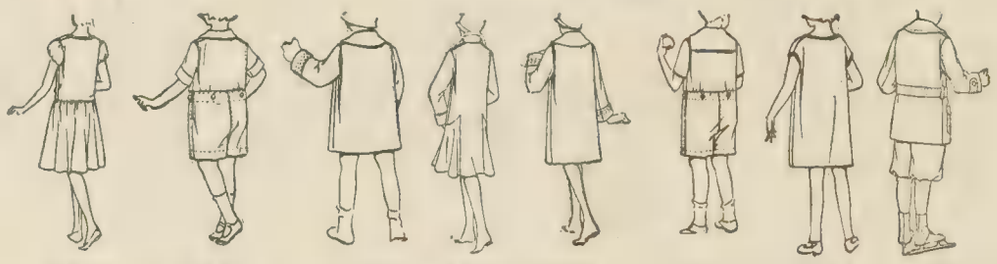
The suit is for little boys 2 to 5 years.

6480—4834—4038—This double-breasted, straight-line coat, with sleeves pointed at the top, is smart with a gored-crown hat and leggings.

6 years and 20½-inch head measure require 1¾ yards 54-inch tweed for coat and hat.

The coat is for little girls 1 to 7 years; hat for girls and tiny boys 2 to 12; leggings for children 2 to 14.

6468—A circular flare attached across the sides in curved outline makes this new coat, with its one-piece back and front, interesting.



13 years requires 3⅜ yards 35-inch velveteen.

The coat is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6488—5458—The straight-line double-breasted coat points its sleeves at the top. The tam-o'-shanter is gored.

12 years requires 2 yards 54-inch camel's-hair for coat.

The coat is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years; tam for girls, children, ladies and misses.

6462 6450 6480 6468 6488 6474 6382 6490

6474—Double-breasted, of course, like the styles for bigger but not better men, and with a sailor's collar, this little suit buttons straight trousers to its waist. Use serge, gabardine, linen, linen-finished cottons, drill, piqué, poplin, chambray, madras, pongee, etc.

4 years requires ⅞ yard 54-inch wool jersey.

The suit is for little boys 3 to 6 years.

6382—10984—An old-fashioned girl makes a new-fashioned pocket. Work in appliqué. This one-piece slip-over dress is smart in Canton crêpe, flat crêpe, rayon, etc., with Georgette sleeves, etc.

7 years requires 1¾ yards 35-inch velveteen and ½ yard 39-inch Georgette.

The dress is adorable for girls 6 to 12 years.

6490—5950—4068—A warm mackinaw with a convertible collar, golf knickers and a polo cap shut out wintry blasts. Use mixtures, etc., for mackinaw.

8 years requires 1⅝ yards 54-inch plaid for mackinaw and 1 yard 44-inch serge for knickers.

The mackinaw is for boys 4 to 16 years; knickers for boys 8 to 17; cap for children 2 to 12.

THE SMART FROCK CHOOSES A STYLE FROM FLARED, PRINCESS AND STRAIGHTLINE MODES

6471—Rather jaunty with a hand-made flower of contrasting velvet ribbon or metallic kid is this frock with its chic front closing. Make it of heavy silk crêpe, faille silk, etc., or use cashmere, camel's-hair twill, light-weight kasha, homespun, etc. The lower edge is straight. Lower edge 44½ inches.

36 bust requires 3 yards 39-inch heavy satin.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust, also misses.

6467—A one-piece slip-over dress—but with a difference! An underfront extends to the underarm seams. Use twills, camel's-hair twills, etc., with harmonizing satin or silk crêpe; or use crêpe satin, satin Canton, etc.

36 bust requires 2¼ yards 54-inch light-weight kasha and 1½ yards 35-inch silk crêpe. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is charming for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6434—Self-trimmed, bordered wide crêpe satins, Canton crêpes, satin and faille, 54-inch ombré velvets, etc., are best displayed by a one-piece, slip-over frock that fits closely at the hipline, has a straight lower edge and matching Georgette sleeves.

36 bust requires 1½ yards 54-inch bordered velvet broché and ⅞ yard 39-inch chiffon. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust, also misses.

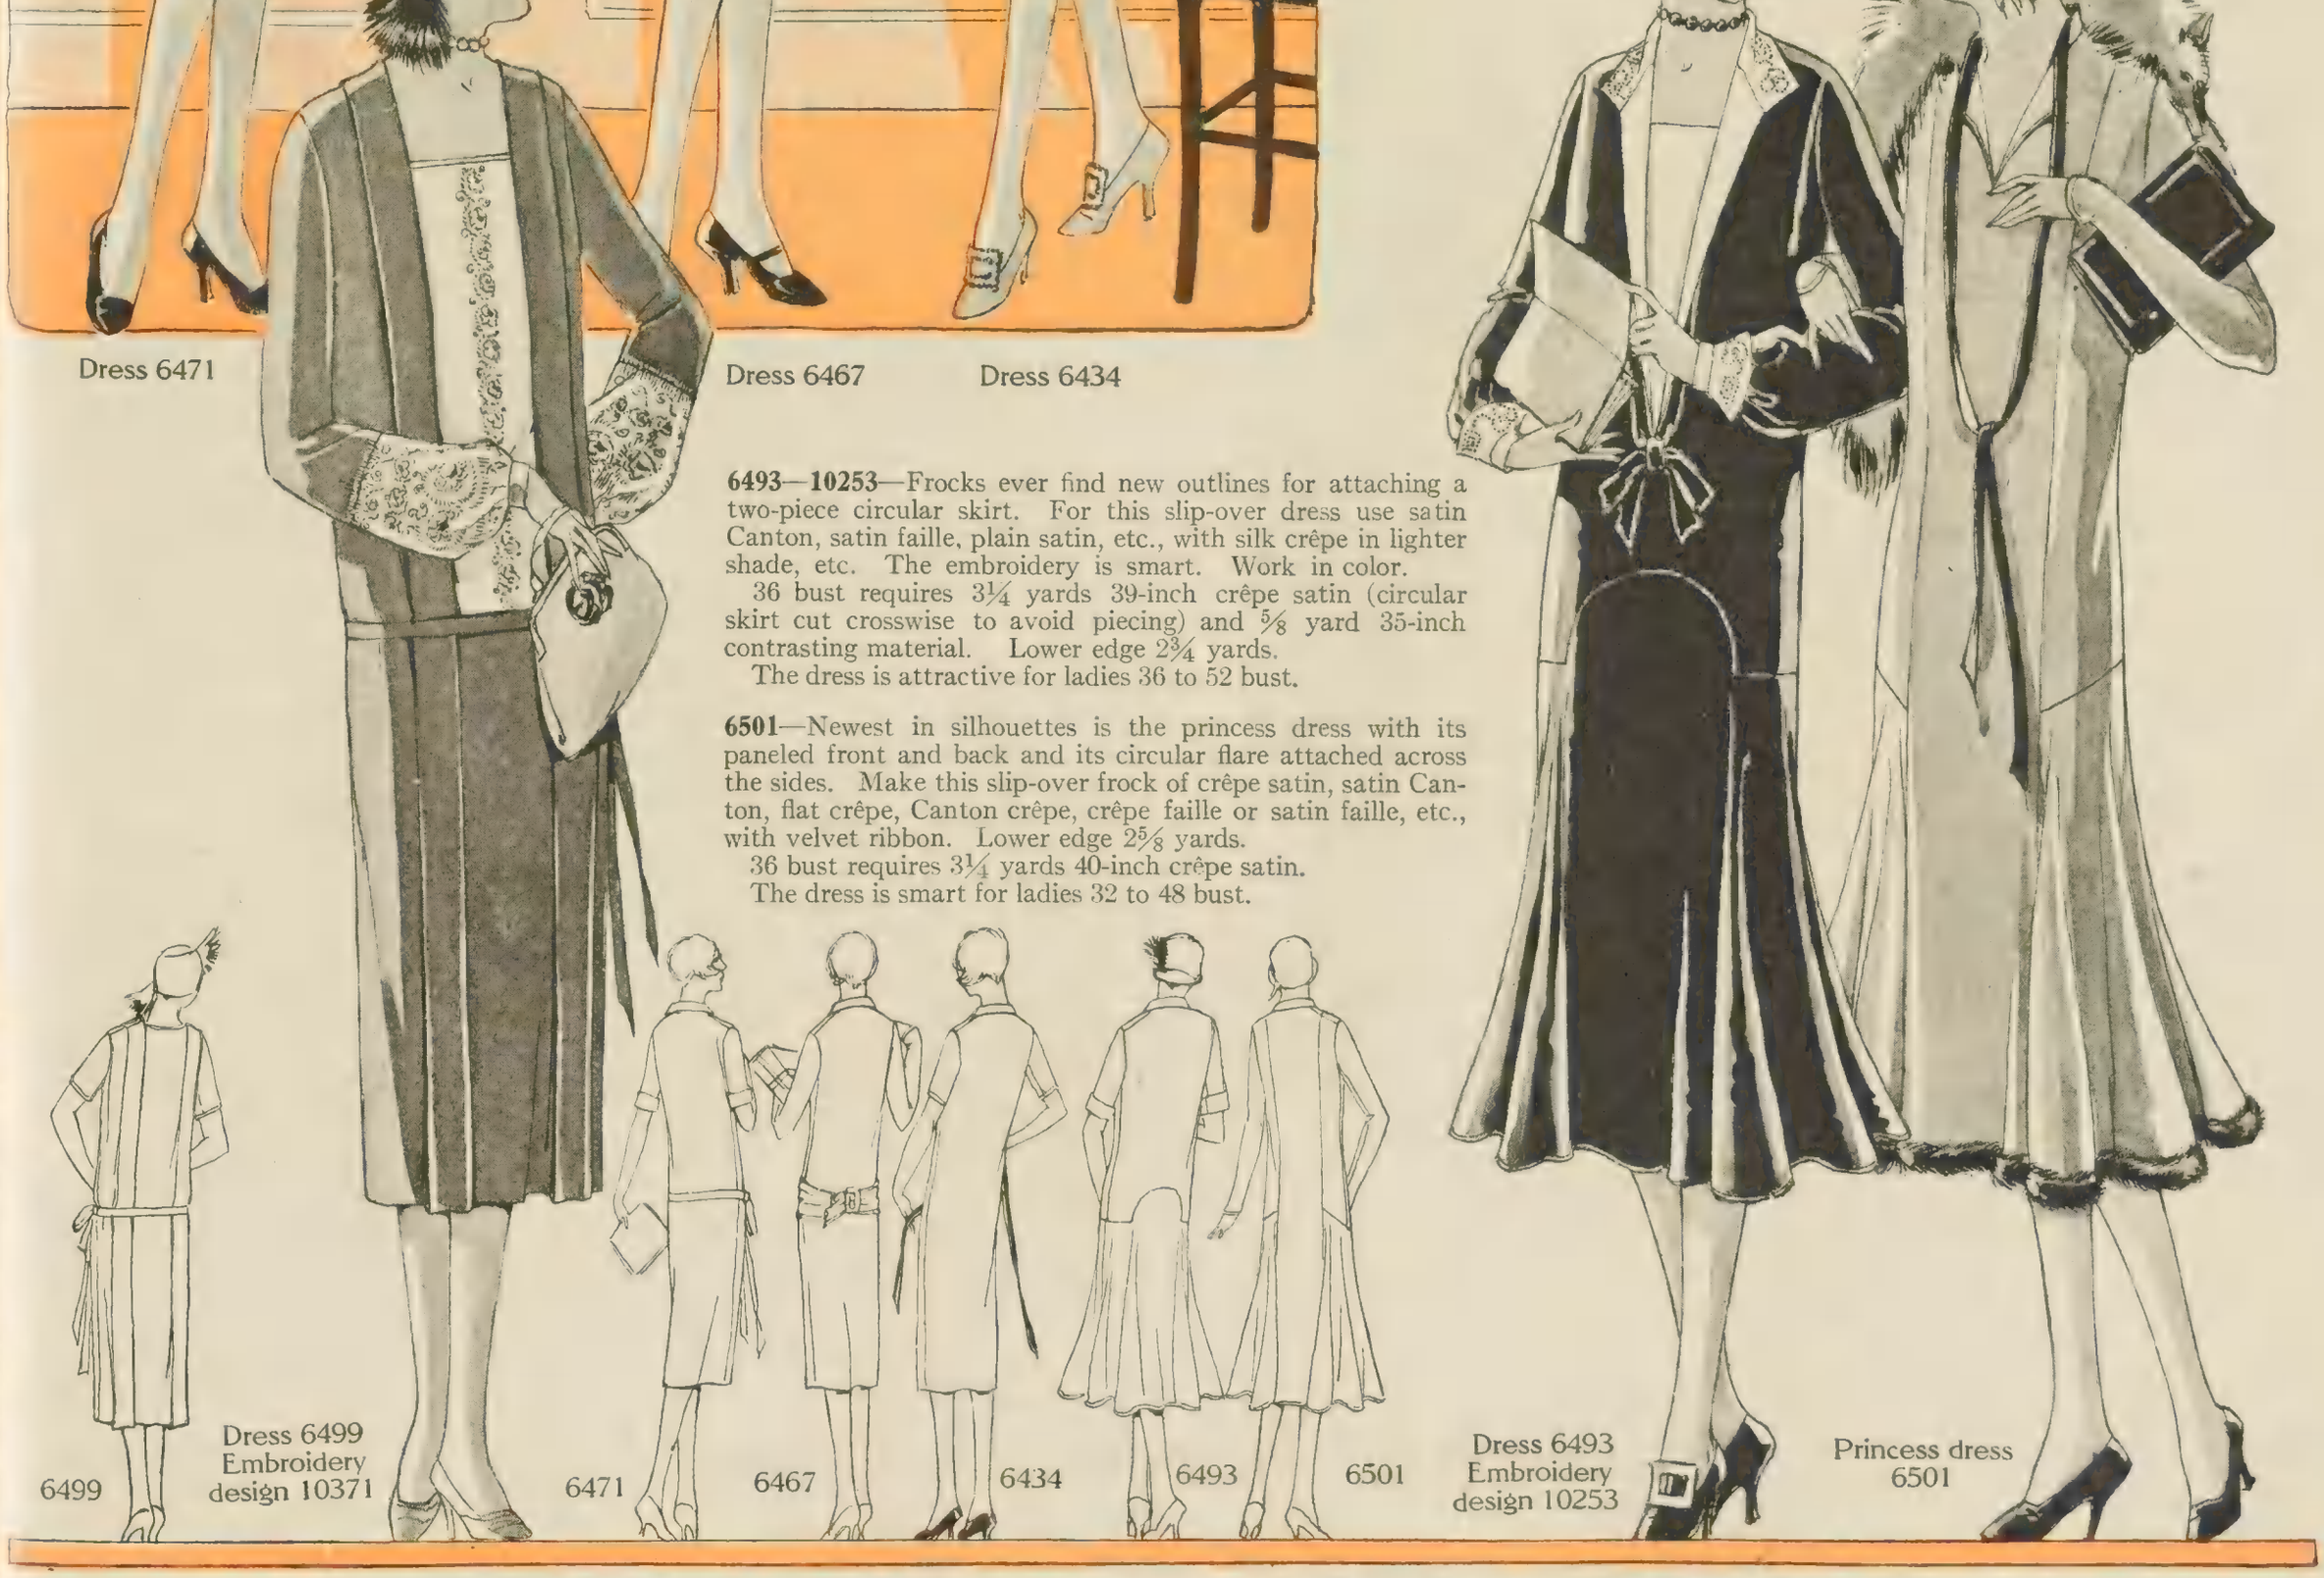
6499—10371—Slenderizing agents are the narrow, loose panels at each side front and back of this slip-over, one-piece frock. The embroidery is charming. Work in color. Use cashmere, soft wool crêpe, etc., with satin in lighter or darker shades; or crêpe satin, satin Canton, etc. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 2¼ yards 54-inch twill (with ¾ yard 35-inch material to line panels) and ½ yard 35-inch satin.

The dress is becoming to ladies 36 to 52 bust.

Dress 6471 Dress 6467 Dress 6434

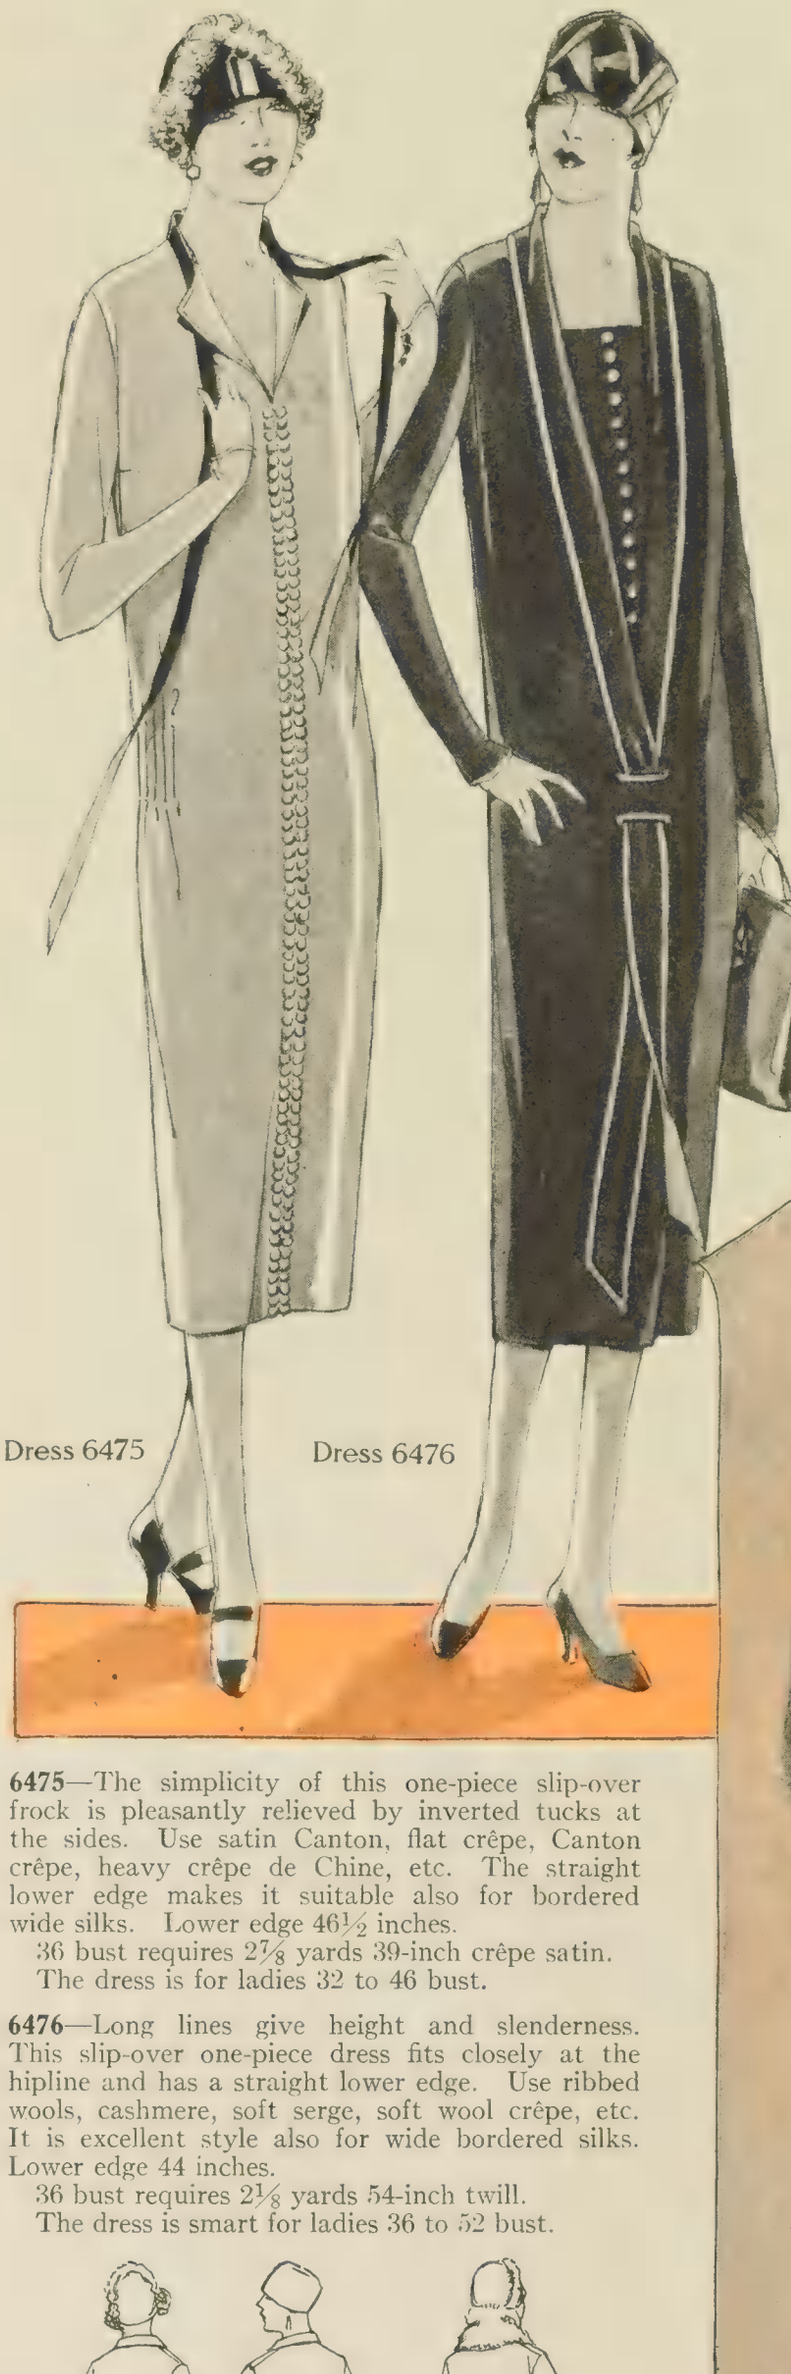
6493—10253—Frocks ever find new outlines for attaching a two-piece circular skirt. For this slip-over dress use satin Canton, satin faille, plain satin, etc., with silk crêpe in lighter shade, etc. The embroidery is smart. Work in color.



36 bust requires 3¼ yards 39-inch crêpe satin (circular skirt cut crosswise to avoid piecing) and ⅝ yard 35-inch contrasting material. Lower edge 2¾ yards.

The dress is attractive for ladies 36 to 52 bust.

6501—Newest in silhouettes is the princess dress with its paneled front and back and its circular flare attached across the sides. Make this slip-over frock of crêpe satin, satin Canton, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille or satin faille, etc., with velvet ribbon. Lower edge 2⅝ yards.



36 bust requires 3¼ yards 40-inch crêpe satin.

The dress is smart for ladies 32 to 48 bust.

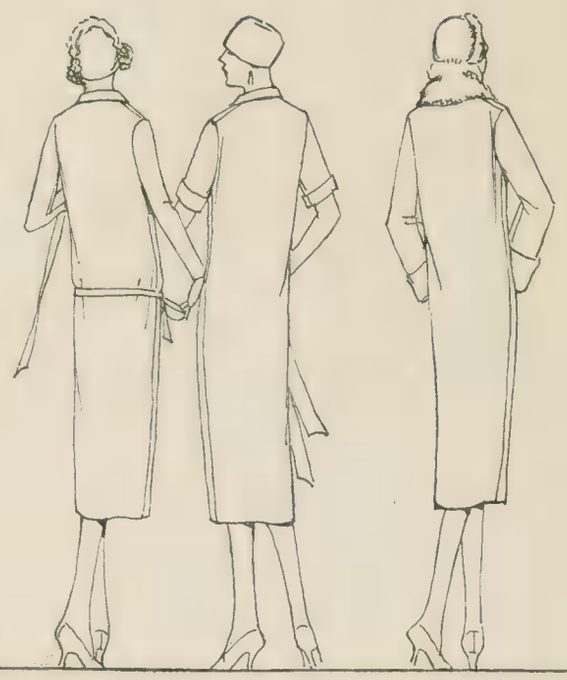
THE FLATTERING POSSIBILITIES OF THE PRINCESS LINE AND ITS FLARE, OF NEW COLLARS AND INTERESTING SLEEVES

Dress 6475 Dress 6476

6475—The simplicity of this one-piece slip-over frock is pleasantly relieved by inverted tucks at the sides. Use satin Canton, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine, etc. The straight lower edge makes it suitable also for bordered wide silks. Lower edge 46½ inches.



36 bust requires 2⅞ yards 39-inch crêpe satin.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 46 bust.

6476—Long lines give height and slenderness. This slip-over one-piece dress fits closely at the hipline and has a straight lower edge. Use ribbed wools, cashmere, soft serge, soft wool crêpe, etc. It is excellent style also for wide bordered silks. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 2⅛ yards 54-inch twill.

The dress is smart for ladies 36 to 52 bust.

6475 6476 6437

Coat 6437 Coat 6431

6437—A coat of some elegance adopts the smart tuxedo collar and puff sleeve of fur or fabric fur. It is worn in straight-line style or wrapped around and has a pocket on the lining. Use short-nap coatings, kasha, smooth-faced plain coatings, coatings in novelty weaves, etc. Lower edge 47 inches.

36 bust requires 3⅞ yards 39-inch velvet and ¾ yard 50-inch fabric fur.

The coat is for ladies 32 to 44 bust, also misses.

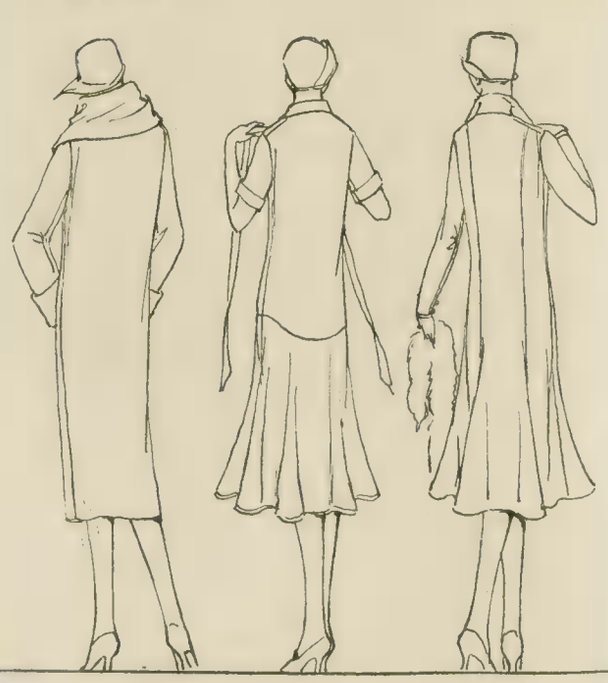
6431—A flatterer is the soft crushed collar that frames the face becomingly. Make this straight-line coat, with a pocket on the lining, of velvet, smooth-faced plain coatings, kasha, novelty coatings, Ottoman weaves, etc., or use satin or corded silk with kasha lining. Lower edge 47 inches.

36 bust requires 3 yards 54-inch short-nap coating.

The coat is becoming to ladies 32 to 48 bust, also misses.

Dress 6484 Princess coat dress 6481

6484—The way of a frock with a circular flounce is to attach it in a new outline. Use satin Canton, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, satin faille, crepe satin and similar materials for this one-piece slip-over dress.



36 bust requires 3⅜ yards 39-inch novelty crêpe satin with no up or down. Lower edge 2⅝ yards.

The dress is good style for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6481—The princess styles suggest the line of the figure, fit closely at the hipline and flare out at the hem. Twills, worsteds, cashmere, kasha, camel's-hair, heavy satin, heavy silk crêpe, etc., are smart for this princess coat-dress. Lower edge 2 yards.

36 bust requires 3⅝ yards 39-inch velvet.

The princess coat-dress is charming for ladies 32 to 48 bust.

COATS HAVE FUR COLLARS AND A CHOICE OF SILHOUETTES

6506—Light-weight wool jersey, light-weight flannel, crêpe satin, etc., all of one material or with contrasting, make up smartly in this style. The inserted plait at the center front gives freedom as well as chic to this one-piece slip-over dress with the smart saddle shoulder. Lower edge, plaits drawn out, measures 54 inches.

36 bust requires 2¼ yards 54-inch wool jersey.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust, also misses.

6430—The deep armhole of this charming wrap keeps the dress beneath from being crushed. For afternoons use short-nap coatings, or velvet or satin with kasha lining, etc. For evening wear use velvet, heavy satin or brocades in black or in color. It is worn wrapped around or in straight-line style and has a pocket on the lining.

36 bust requires 2¾ yards 54-inch cloth.

For ladies 32 to 44 bust, also misses.

6439—The princess coat ripples at the sides—the result of a flared underarm gore. The collar is most becoming, whether worn closed or rolled back. Use fabric fur, velvet, short-nap coating, kasha, smooth-faced plain coatings, coatings in novelty weaves; or plain or novelty ribbed silks or satin with kasha lining, etc.

36 bust requires 3⅜ yards 48-inch fabric fur. Lower edge measures 1⅞ yard.

The coat is for ladies 32 to 48 bust, also misses.

THE FLARE THAT SWINGS A COAT OR FROCK RULES THE FASHION WORLD

Dress 6502

Dress 6485

Dress 6496
Transfer 10361

6485—The smart lines of this frock suggest the new long blouse. The attached lower part gives it a two-piece appearance. The dress slips on over the head and may be made of bordered wools or bordered silks or crosswise designs with a matching plain lower part and tie collar; or use crêpe satin, satin Canton, heavy crêpe de Chine, flat crêpe, etc. Lower edge, plaits out, 2⅛ yards.

36 bust requires 2⅜ yards 54-inch bordered wool.

It is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6496—10361—There is softness and grace in the slip-over one-piece dress with fulness below the saddle shoulder, above the cuff and in the circular folds of side flares. It fits closely at the hipline. The embroidery is chic. It matches the dress. Use crêpe satin, heavy crêpe de Chine or plain soft satin with metallic kid or with contrasting; or use chiffon velvet, etc. Lower edge 2⅝ yards.

36 bust requires 3⅜ yards 40-inch crêpe satin.

It is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6502—The saddle shoulder gives a graceful slope to the sleeve top of a slip-over dress. The two-piece circular skirt is attached at the hipline, where the dress fits closely. Use crêpe satin, soft satin or heavy crêpe de Chine with metallic kid and novelty buttons, etc. Lower edge 2½ yards.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 39-inch crêpe satin (skirt cut crosswise).

The dress is smart for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6436—The easy lines of the flared coat make it altogether desirable for velvet, short-nap coatings, kasha, smooth-faced plain coatings, coatings in novelty weaves, or for ribbed silk with kasha lining, etc. The circular flare makes a pointed outline where it is attached across the front. There is a pocket on the lining. Lower edge 2 yards.

36 bust requires 3⅞ yards 39-inch velvet.

The coat is for ladies 32 to 44 bust, also misses.

6453—A smart dress that is very simple to make has a straight lower edge, is one-piece in type and slips on over the head. The sleeve has two seams and the collar may be worn closed. Make it of kasha, twills, worsteds, cashmere, serge, wool crêpe, camel's-hair twills, heavy silk crêpe or heavy satin, etc. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 2⅛ yards 54-inch kasha.

The dress is for ladies 36 to 52 bust.

6438—This coat's distinguished bearing is due to the sweep of the shawl collar and the swing of the circular flare attached across the back in curved outline. It may be worn in straight-line style or wrapped around. Use velvet, short-nap coatings, coatings in novelty weaves, etc., with fabric fur or fur. Lower edge 1⅞ yard.

36 bust requires 2⅜ yards 54-inch cloth.

It is becoming to ladies 32 to 46 bust, also misses.

GAY AND USEFUL GIFTS FOR FAMILY AND FRIENDS, ALL OF THEM DELIGHTFULLY EASY TO MAKE

5732—An outing-shirt that any man would like is very easy to make. Use broadcloth, pongee, madras, etc.

3998—For the man who enjoys comfort and good looks combined make a bathrobe and slippers of blankets, flannel or blanket robing.

3450—A dressing gown or lounging-robe of polo cloth, silk rep, silk faille, shantung, satin, etc., is nice for a man to slip into after a fatiguing day. The slippers are comfortable.

4836—Whether young or old, at home or at college, a man needs a warm house coat for a smoking jacket.

6472—Dainty wreaths of rosebuds and Val lace trim a combination step-in and bandeau brassière of crêpe de Chine, triple voile, etc. The ribbon-covered garters are new.

6031—4830—What college girl will not welcome a Christmas gift of pajamas for Sunday breakfast parties after the holidays? Make them of plain or printed crêpe de Chine or wash silk or satin frilled with a wealth of insertion and lace. Dainty boudoir caps of lace edging, ribbon and flowers in bandeau style keep water-wave combs in place.

4644—Georgette in the new rose or blue shades makes a delightful dressing-sack when bordered and trimmed with fluffy bands of swan's-down.

5936—A suitable gift for the bride-elect is a lace-and-flower-trimmed nightgown of crêpe de Chine, Georgette, wash silk or satin that packs neatly in a traveling-bag. The pocket is smart.

4116—Your Sunday-evening-supper hostess would appreciate as a gift a set of attractive aprons of dotted swiss, cross-bar, white lawn or organdy trimmed with lace.

3961—The goose border at once endears this new little bathrobe to a youngster's heart. Use blanket cloth, blankets, eider-down, flannel, etc.

5605—A gift for a baby is an eider-down sleeping-bag of blanket cloth, quilted China silk, etc., bound with pink or blue ribbon. The set-in sleeves are very comfortable.

Vegetable Soup everybody likes!

Vegetable is a soup that allows of no "skimping" in the number of ingredients and the quantity used. The moment any attempt is made to reduce them, it can be detected at once in the loss of richness and flavor. We have studied the proper blending of vegetable soup for many years and we know and make exactly "the kind everybody likes." From the very first taste, it will be your favorite.

Every spoonful of Campbell's Vegetable Soup is heavily laden with the "solid" vegetables and other ingredients. There are no less than fifteen different vegetables — the finest grown; hearty cereals; invigorating beef broth; herbs and seasoning; thirty-two ingredients in all! Housewives long ago gave up the trouble and expense of making vegetable soup — they serve Campbell's! And often find it enough for a meal, too!

Now all it has of pep and jazz
I put upon the air,
And when I'm through, I'm telling you,
I want my Campbell's there!

Dolly Varden Cake

(ABOVE)

1½ cups sugar — ⅓ cup Crisco
1 cup milk — 1 teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon almond extract
3 egg whites — 3 cups pastry flour
3 teaspoons baking powder

Cream Crisco. Add sugar and cream together until light and soft. Sift dry ingredients and add alternately with milk. Add extract, beat mixture thoroughly and last fold in stiffly beaten egg whites. Turn into well-Criscoed Angel Cake pan and bake in moderate oven (350° F.) one hour. Remove from oven. Let stand ten minutes, then turn upside down on cake board—the cake will drop out whole. When cool, ice.

Icing:

Add two tablespoons of cream to three egg yolks. Stir in enough confectioner's sugar to make it thick enough to spread easily. Flavor with almond and a pinch of salt. Cover entire outside of cake.

Prune Cake

2 cups pastry flour — 1 cup sugar
¼ cup Crisco — ½ cup sweet milk
1 teaspoon soda — ½ teaspoon salt
2 eggs (separated)
1 teaspoon cinnamon
½ teaspoon allspice
1 cup stewed and mashed prunes

Cream Crisco and sugar thoroughly. Add egg yolks well beaten. Then stir in prunes. Sift together, soda, spices, salt and flour and add alternately with milk. Last fold in beaten egg whites. Bake in loaf pan, one hour in moderate oven (325° F.).

Be sure prunes are thoroughly drained of all juice.

Standard Layer Cake

(ABOVE)

This recipe can be used as a standard for a variety of layer cakes. It will make a large 3-layer cake, and also six cup cakes. Or, instead of making the cup cakes, you can make four layers, making two cakes of two layers each.

¾ cup Crisco — 2 cups sugar
1 teaspoon salt — 4 eggs, separated
1⅓ cups milk — 3 cups pastry flour
2 teaspoons baking powder
1 teaspoon vanilla

Cream Crisco and sugar together thoroughly. Add egg yolks, well beaten. Beat in the milk, a little at a time. Then add ¾ cup flour and beat until smooth. Sift rest of flour with baking powder and salt. Add to mixture and mix thoroughly. Add vanilla. Last fold in well-beaten egg whites. Divide batter into three well-Criscoed layer cake pans and six cup cakes. Bake in hot oven (375° F.), about 15 minutes. When partly cool, turn out on towel. When quite cold, spread filling between and on top of the layers.

Delicious Pastry and Fried Foods, too

Crisco is by no means limited to cake making. I find that I can always depend on Crisco for uniformly tender, flaky pie crusts, dainty biscuits, muffins, desserts of all kinds, breads of every description, while for frying, either in the deep kettle, in the frying pan or on the griddle, well, Crisco is one of those things we used to think too good to be true. Crisco gives us smokeless frying and, at the same time, dainty well-cooked fried food with a crisp brown outside, free from grease or taste of fat.

How I make perfect

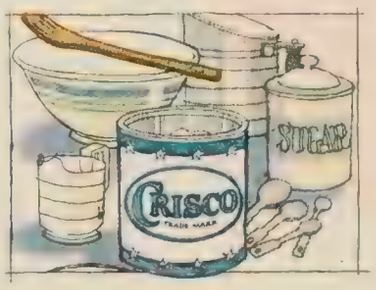
ARE you one of the women who say, "I wish I knew how to make good cake, mine never comes out right," or "I never have any luck making cake, and have given up trying"?

Don't you think the cakes you see in the pictures on this page look delicious? I am going to tell you exactly how these cakes were made so you can make them, too, because I think every one really wants to know how to make good cakes which come out right every time and are as good to look at and as delicious to eat as these are.

A systematic start saves doubt and anxiety

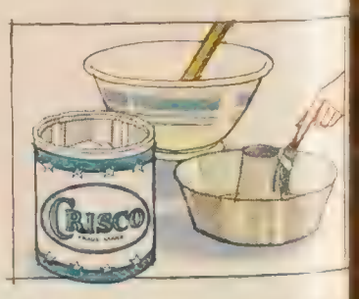
Success depends on following your recipe and method carefully. So be sure to read your recipe and method through to the end before you start to work. Then start your oven, and get out all the utensils you will need and grease your pans.

When you grease them with Crisco, you do not need to flour them. Crisco contains no moisture to cause your cakes to stick to the pans and scorch. Therefore, your cakes will come out whole with no unsightly breaks and an even brown all over.



Measurements must be accurate

It is easier to get accurate measurements if we use the standard measuring cups and spoons. They were used in making up these recipes and cost only a few cents.



Here is a way I have found to measure shortening accurately. To measure, for example, ¾ of a cup of Crisco, I take a measuring cup, put in ¼ cup of cold water, then add enough Crisco to bring the water to the top of the cup, pour it off, and I have an exact ¾ cup of Crisco.

The importance of the right Shortening

I will confess, I have always had a reputation for making good cakes. I used to make all my cakes with butter. After I found Crisco and learned to make my cakes with it, using no butter at all, I found I still had perfectly delicious cakes, and my reputation for good cake was just as high as ever.

Standard measuring cups and spoons make for accuracy

I always grease my cake tins with Crisco

Cakes— every time

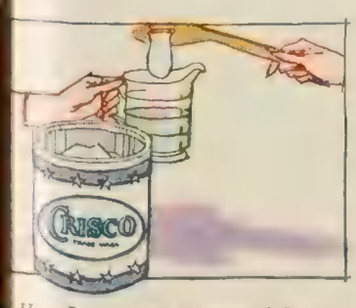
The cakes pictured on these pages were all made entirely with Crisco. When compared with cakes made with butter, no one could tell the difference. If you are one of those who simply find it unbelievable that you can use all Crisco in cakes, try half butter and half Crisco at first. Then next time, perhaps, three-fourths Crisco and one-fourth butter. I am sure you will be so pleased with the results, that before you know it you will be using all Crisco for all your cakes.

The importance of creaming Shortening and Sugar

Not everyone realizes the importance of creaming the shortening and sugar together. The purpose is to soften the grains of sugar, and this is done by creating the sugar with the shortening until the mixture is soft and fluffy, and does not feel grainy to the spoon.

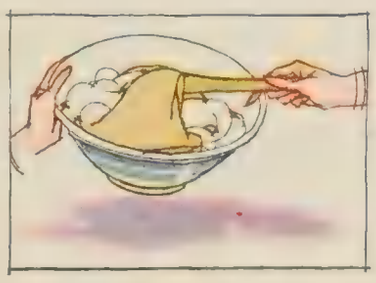
Fruits and nuts should be added after the eggs and before the milk and flour. (This will insure even distribution, no nuts and raisins at the bottom of the cake.) If fruit is washed, it should be thoroughly dried before using.

To have your layers even and of uniform thickness, divide your batter in equal parts and spread evenly over the bottom of the pans.



Correct baking temperature important

Up-to-date recipes give you correct temperature. If you are an experienced cake-maker and have never used a thermometer, you, of course, have your favorite way of testing your oven for the proper heat. If not, I advise you to buy an inexpensive oven thermometer. It will be a great help to you.



When you make the cakes you see on this page, following the directions I have given you, and using Crisco, I know your cakes will be as good as these in the pictures, and you, too, will have made a reputation for good cake.

If you have your own favorite cake recipes, simply use Crisco in the place of the shortening your recipe calls for, adding 1 teaspoon of salt to every cup of Crisco used.

How I measure ¾ cup of Crisco accurately (see main text, above)

It's important to cream the shortening and sugar

Mother's Tea Cake

(ABOVE)

⅓ cup Crisco — 1 cup sugar
2 eggs (beaten) — ½ teaspoon salt
½ cup milk — 1½ cups pastry flour
1 teaspoon baking powder
½ teaspoon vanilla

Cream together Crisco, salt and sugar. Beat until light and soft. Add eggs mixing thoroughly. Sift flour and baking powder and add alternately with milk. Add vanilla. Beat well and turn into well-Criscoed shallow baking pan. Bake in hot oven (375° F.), one-half hour. When partly cool, dust with powdered sugar, cut in squares and serve while warm. This is a dainty, light cake which can be stirred up quickly for lunch, supper or afternoon tea.

Cocoa Marshmallow Cake (ABOVE)

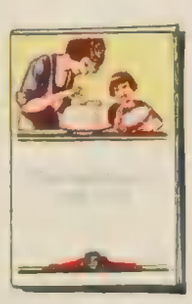
PART ONE

2 tablespoons cocoa — 1 cup brown sugar
½ cup sweet milk — 1 egg yolk

Put ingredients in Part One in a double boiler. Cook until thoroughly blended. Cool.

PART TWO:

½ cup Crisco — 1 cup brown sugar
½ cup sweet milk — 2 egg yolks, unbeaten
2 cups pastry flour — 1 teaspoon vanilla
3 egg whites, well beaten
1 teaspoon soda dissolved in water



Cream Crisco and sugar together thoroughly. Add two egg yolks and beat in thoroughly. Then add Part One and vanilla, and mix thoroughly. Then add alternately milk and flour. Next fold in egg whites and last, soda dissolved in one tablespoon hot water. Divide in two layer cake pans which have been greased with Crisco. Bake in hot oven (375° F.) about 15 minutes.

Marshmallow Nut Icing:

2 cups granulated sugar
½ cup boiling water
2 egg whites (well beaten)
12 to 18 large marshmallows
½ cup pecans, cut fine

Boil water and sugar together until it spins a thread. Then beat slowly into egg whites. Cool slightly, add marshmallows broken in pieces and one teaspoon vanilla. Spread over cake before it is quite cold. Sprinkle chopped pecans over top.

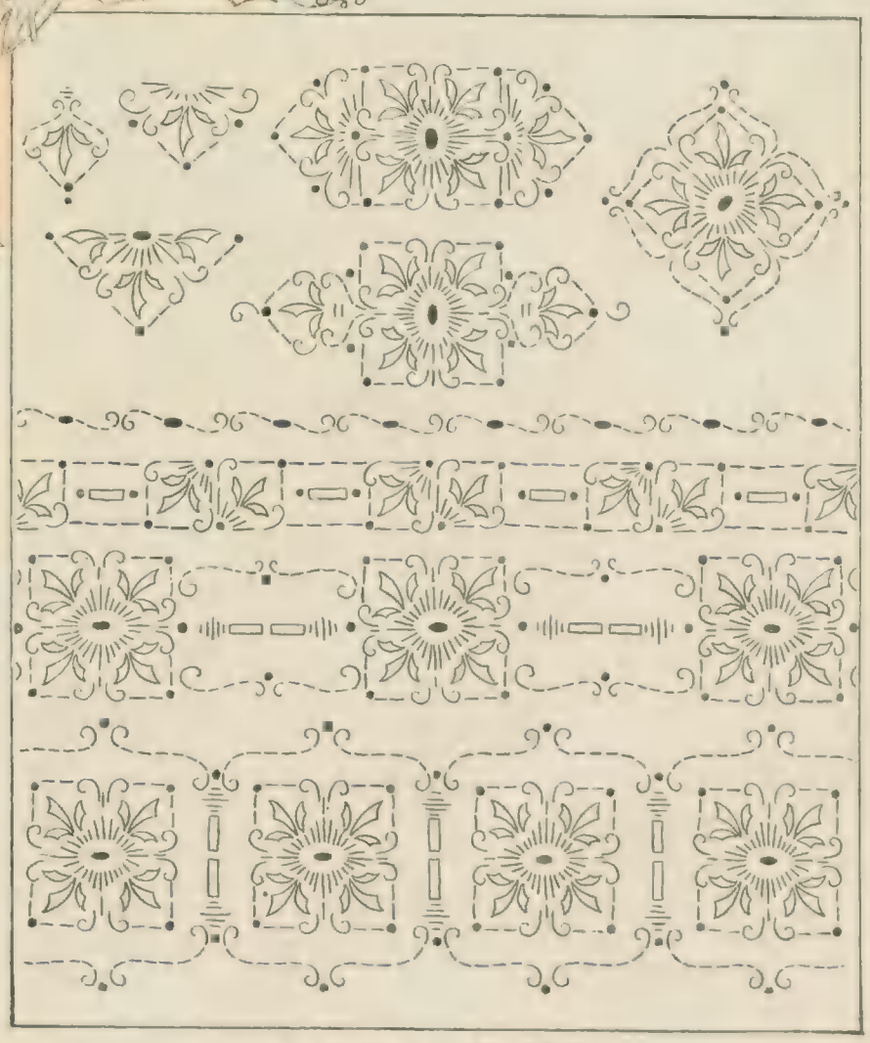
EMBROIDERY'S HOLIDAY SHOWING OF HANDKERCHIEFS, QUAINT FIGURES FOR NURSERY FURNISHINGS AND LOVELY DESIGNS FOR DRESS TRIMMING

Embroidery design 10396

10396—No one ever has enough handkerchiefs—enough nice handkerchiefs, for the nice ones have a way of losing themselves. This explains why every one likes to find them in Christmas packages. Handkerchiefs with these motifs and monograms are delightful to make. Work in satin-stitch, drawn threads, worm-stitch, lazy-daisy, French knots, French stemming and outline. The design can be adapted to 33 assorted motifs in twenty different styles, one alphabet $\frac{7}{8}$ inch high and another alphabet $\frac{3}{8}$ inch high.

10394—Jewel-like in design, this embroidery is most effective in jewel colors—topaz and aquamarine, lapis and gold, sapphire and silver, with onyx to bring out the tones. It is very lovely for dresses, blouses, coats, hats, scarfs, etc., and is worked entirely in one-stitch. The design can be adapted to $2\frac{5}{8}$ yards of banding $6\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, $1\frac{5}{8}$ yards of banding 3 inches wide and 14 motifs in five assorted designs.

Miss Marie Ashley will be glad to answer any question about needlework if you will write to her, care of the Butterick Publishing Company, New York, N. Y., and enclose a self-addressed, stamped envelope



Embroidery design 10394

10401—Almost a filigree effect is obtained by a design that uses outline stitch, one-stitch and satin-stitch to reproduce itself on frocks and blouses, coats, scarfs, hats, etc. In this case a little work makes a very smart showing. The design can be adapted to $1\frac{5}{8}$ yards each of banding $6\frac{1}{4}$ inches and $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, 5 yards each of banding $1\frac{3}{4}$ inches and $\frac{1}{2}$ inch wide and 30 motifs in six assorted designs.

10395—Alice and the White Rabbit, Tweedledum and Tweedledee, the Mad Hatter, the Cheshire Cat, and all the others make a Wonderland of the nursery. These figures are also charming for children's clothes, bibs, aprons, etc. They are worked in a combination of outline stitch, one-stitch, French knots and satin-stitch embroidery. The design can be adapted to $1\frac{3}{4}$ yards of 3-inch banding and 80 assorted motifs.

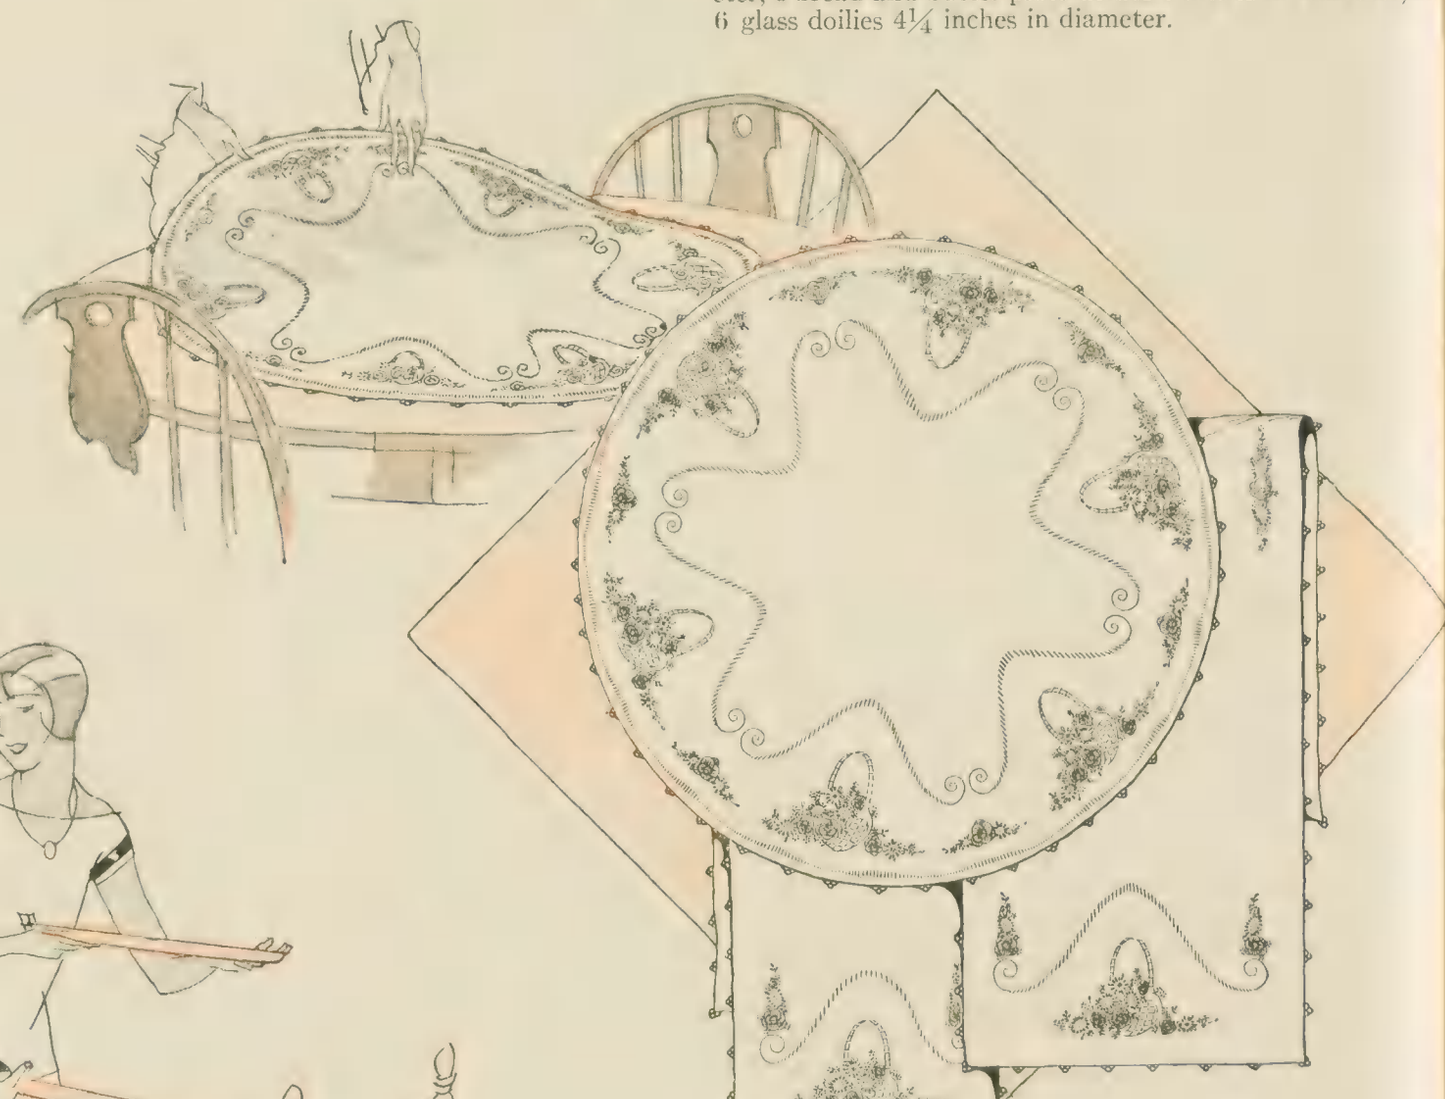
THE FLOWERS THAT BLOOM ON HOLIDAY LINENS HAVE EVERYTHING TO DO WITH THE GIFT-GIVING SEASON

Embroidery design 10397

10397—A domestic design to delight a young housewife who would make her kitchen an attractive workroom is this, with motifs quaint, for tea-towels, shelving, etc. To make cheerful kitchen curtains use one motif in a bright color in the center of each curtain or embroider the charming little dish-and-flower-spray border above each hem. Work in a combination of one-stitch, outline-stitch, lazy-daisy and French-knot embroidery. The design can be adapted to 1¾ yards of 1¼-inch banding and 19 assorted motifs in 14 different styles.

10399—A collection of corners and motifs is an inspiration to the needlewoman who realizes how a touch of embroidery beautifies linens. Tea-cloths, linen scarfs, napkins, square centerpieces, etc., can be made from this design. The embroidery is worked in cross-stitch, or in a combination of one-stitch, lazy-daisy stitch, French knots and outline embroidery. The design can be adapted to 4 corners of each of the following sizes: 7 by 11¼ inches, 4 by 12¾ inches, 4¾ by 10¼ inches, 2 corners 6 by 13¼ inches and 54 assorted motifs.



Miss Marie Ashley will gladly give any help that you may need with your needlework if you will write her, care of the Butterick Publishing Company, New York, N. Y., and enclose a self-addressed stamped envelope

Embroidery design 10400

10400—The chrysanthemum is the favorite flower of linens. Conventionalized, it is used for a very complete luncheon set and should be embroidered in satin-stitch, French knots and French-stemming embroidery. The design can be adapted to one 26-inch centerpiece, 6 plate doilies 10¼ inches in diameter, 6 bread-and-butter plate doilies 6 inches in diameter, and 6 glass doilies 4¼ inches in diameter.

Embroidery design 10399

Embroidery design 10398

10398—For a colored centerpiece and scarf the lazy-daisy design is most effective with least labor. On blue, tan or white, flowers of every harmonizing hue tumble from charming embroidered baskets. The design may be worked in a combination of one-stitch, lazy-daisy or satin-stitch, outline and French-knot embroidery. It can be adapted to one 36-inch centerpiece, three motifs 8½ by 16¼ inches, three motifs 8½ by 12¼ inches and six motifs 1½ by 7 inches for ends on a large and small scarf.

SO SIMPLE IT'S HARD TO BELIEVE

Yet this fresh, new food works surely, naturally. Here is the whole secret of its power:

NOT a "cure-all," not a medicine in any sense—Fleischmann's Yeast is simply a remarkable fresh food.

The millions of tiny active yeast plants in every cake invigorate the whole system. They aid digestion—clear the skin—banish the poisons of constipation. Where cathartics give only temporary relief, yeast strengthens the intestinal muscles and makes them healthy and active. And day by day it releases new stores of energy.

Eat two or three cakes regularly every day before meals: on crackers—in fruit juices or milk—or just plain. For constipation especially, dissolve one cake in hot water (not scalding) before breakfast and at bedtime. Buy several cakes at a time—they will keep fresh in a cool dry place for two or three days. All grocers have Fleischmann's Yeast. Start eating it today!

And let us send you a free copy of our latest booklet on Yeast for Health. Health Research Dept. C-23, The Fleischmann Company, 701 Washington Street, New York.

"TWO MONTHS AGO my four-year old daughter took her first yeast cake. It immediately satisfied a craving for something that her food did not contain. Her vitality has been wonderfully increased. None of the children's activities seem too strenuous for her. She says she is always warm on the coldest days. She used to be a bunch of shivers. She was called pale face—now her cheeks are rosy red. And she comes in from play asking for yeast, not candy. Fleischmann's Yeast has solved all my worries."
MRS. MILO GRIFFITH, Racine, Wis.

(LEFT)

"I HAVE KEPT A HOTEL, most all my life. My son, his wife and their eight children live with me. You can imagine the demands on my time and strength. We prepared and served quantities of rich food. My health became impaired. My stomach was greatly affected. I was miserable. But one day Fleischmann's Yeast was recommended. I began eating it. Soon I began to improve.

"Today I am doing about as much work as I did at forty. I can cook Henry's eggs with one hand, make toast for Virginia Lee with the other, answer questions, and smile at the baby, all at the same time."
MRS. S. VAN SANT, Marietta, Oklahoma.

(RIGHT)

"ON APRIL THE 30TH, 1924, the little town of Ficklin was almost destroyed by a cyclone. For weeks after I was very nervous. This nervousness caused me to suffer from indigestion. Not properly digesting my food brought on chronic constipation and most unsightly pimples. I decided to eat yeast. For several weeks I took one or two cakes each day. I am now free from nervousness, indigestion, constipation and pimples. I feel that I have been rejuvenated by Fleischmann's Yeast."
MRS. G. N. BYRUM, Ficklin, Ga.

"I AM AN OFFICER in the Merchant Marine. Day and night, in fair weather and in foul, duty confines me to the bridge. Unceasing vigilance calls for sustained alertness of faculties. This means keeping clean inside and out. Two years ago I discovered Fleischmann's Yeast. To its daily use from that time do I ascribe my present condition of physical well-being. I have proved it to be an efficacious intestinal cleaner—wonderfully invigorating. This food keeps fresh for days in the refrigerator. I restock at all ports of call. I enjoy a clear skin, fine appetite, an orderly stomach and improved eyesight—further benefits directly traceable to the proper use of Fleischmann's Yeast."
FREDERICK A. MACK, New York City.

THIS FAMOUS FOOD tones up the entire system—banishes constipation, skin troubles, stomach disorders. Start eating it today!

"DURING MY COURSE OF STUDY in medicine about six years ago, I was troubled with boils. As soon as one boil was incised another one would crop up. For two long years I tried to get rid of this malady without success. I was willing to try anything, and on the advice of a fellow-student I began eating yeast—three cakes a day. In less than a month, much to my surprise, my skin entirely cleared up. I kept up the yeast for two more months and my gastro-intestinal tract worked perfectly and from then on I have never had another boil. I have treated successfully cases similar to mine—I strongly recommend Fleischmann's Yeast for suppurative skin diseases."
ANTHONY N MODICA, M.D., New York City.

Make Your Own CHRISTMAS CANDY! — It is delicious and makes a wonderful Gift

Holiday Dainties

4 level tablespoonfuls Knox Sparkling Gelatine
1½ cups boiling water 4 cups granulated sugar
1 cup cold water

Soak the gelatine in the cold water five minutes. Add the boiling water. When dissolved add the sugar and boil slowly for fifteen minutes. Divide into two equal parts. When somewhat cooled add to one part one teaspoonful extract of cinnamon. To the other part add one-half teaspoonful extract of cloves. Pour into shallow tins that have been dipped in cold water. Let stand over night; turn out; cut into squares, roll in fine granulated or powdered sugar; let stand to crystallize. Any coloring desired may be added and any preferred flavoring extract used.

For DESSERT, here is a delightful, old-fashioned Plum Pudding with an entirely "new" touch . .

Christmas Plum Pudding

1 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
1 cup cold water 1 pint milk
1 cup seeded raisins
1 cup sugar Salt ¾ cup dates
1½ squares chocolate
½ teaspoon vanilla ½ cup nuts
½ cup currants 3 egg whites

Soften gelatine in cold water ten minutes. Melt chocolate with part of the sugar; add a little of the milk, making a smooth paste. Put remainder of milk in double boiler, add chopped fruit. When hot add melted chocolate, sugar, salt, and soaked gelatine. Remove from fire; when mixture begins to thicken, add vanilla and nut meats and lastly fold in beaten egg whites. Turn into wet mold decorated with whole nut meats and raisins. Chill, remove to serving dish and garnish with holly. Serve with whipped cream, sweetened and flavored, or with a currant jelly sauce.

CHRISTMAS CAKES AND CONFECTIONS

By Lucile Brewer

GOODIE GIFTS

You can't send a more intimate little gift than a novel package of cake and candy that you make yourself and wrap yourself. We'll send you our leaflet that tells how to make the most enchanting Christmassy baskets of the delicious sweets in this article. Just slip a two-cent stamp for return postage into your letter and send it to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

CHRISTMAS cakes, like Christmas presents, should be joyous surprizes, however much they challenge the ingenuity of the home-maker. And indeed there is no reason why they should not be, when one remembers all the possibilities of red and green icing, fancy shapes and accessories such as angelica, candied fruit and pistachio-nuts.

The first cake that always comes at this season of the year is the fruit-cake. This may be dark with spices and heavy with fruit, or it may be the white fruit-cake, equally delicious and also filled with candied fruits and nuts. Such cakes make ideal gifts and may be baked either large or small.

A "trio of sweets" makes an attractive present. Three small baskets, which may be bought for five or ten cents each, are lined with waxed paper. One of them is filled with a dark fruit-cake, the other with a white fruit-cake, the third with candied fruit. The cakes may be baked in small baking-powder cans and cut to fill the baskets.

Fondant may be made the basis of many interesting and delicious candies, but it is very sweet and should have character added to it by the addition of flavor and color. Melted fondant is used for covering candied fruit mixtures, nuts and so forth. Animals and figures cut from plain cookie-dough, baked, cooled and dipped in melted fondant one at a time, will please any child. The fondant may be tinted.

It would require but a little imagination to produce an irresistible Santa Claus by tinting the fondant a very light pink for the face and hands, a bright red for the cloak and cap, and by using currants for the eyes, a piece of almond for the nose, a candied cherry for the mouth and melted chocolate for the shoes.

Here are a few practical suggestions for Christmas confections:

YULE-LOG CENTERPIECE

Bake a loaf of fruit-cake in an individual bread-pan. Cut in slices one-third of an inch thick, then cut the slices in strips the same width and about six inches long. Dip each strip in melted chocolate and lay on waxed paper. For the chimney cut short strips of cake and cover with melted fondant tinted a deep red with fruit coloring. With the chocolate sticks build the cabin, using the red ones to shape the chimney. For the roof cut plain cookie mixture in strips to represent shingles. Bake these strips, cool and cover with melted coffee fondant. In the chimney place a small Santa Claus.

SANTA POP

Select a candied pear having a stem, which is to serve as the pointed part of Santa's cap. Use the round side for the back. Cover the flat side with white fondant to form a slightly oval surface for the face. With melted chocolate make eyes, mouth and nose. Use long shredded coconut for the beard. Cover the round side of the pear with coconut to represent hair. If it does not stick easily, brush the candied surface with a thin sirup and press the coconut into it.

Into the thick part of the pear opposite the stem insert the pointed end of a wooden skewer, and fit the other end of the skewer into a large wooden button mold which serves as a standard. This makes an attractive place-card for a child's party.

CHOCOLATE CREAMS

2 cups sugar
1 cup water
½ teaspoon vanilla
2 tablespoons white corn-sirup
¼ teaspoon glycerin

Put sugar, water, sirup and glycerin into a saucepan. Stir mixture constantly until sugar is dissolved. Cover and boil for three minutes. The steam formed will prevent sugar crystals from forming on the sides of the saucepan. Remove cover and continue cooking. Wash away any sugar crystals which appear on the sides of the saucepan. Cook to the soft-ball stage (240 degrees Fahrenheit). Remove from fire and pour at once on cold wet platter.

When just lukewarm, stir with a spatula

DAUGHTER of the Duchess and the late Duke of Rutland and direct descendant of that famous Elizabethan beauty, Dorothy Vernon of Haddon Hall, Lady Diana Manners has twenty-four generations of noble blood in her veins. Great sculptors and painters for whom she has sat have found in her exquisite "cool blonde beauty" unusual inspiration. To her, Tennyson's line applies with peculiar aptness: "A daughter of the gods, divinely tall and most divinely fair."

The Lady DIANA MANNERS

believes in this complete means of rejuvenating the skin

. . . a deep refreshing cleansing
. . . a delicate finish and protection

ARISTOCRAT by birth and breeding, from the crown of her golden bobbed head to her slender silk-stockinged ankles, the Lady Diana Manners is a true democrat at heart. She adores beauty for its own pure sake, but also for the happiness it brings to the whole world. And she is genuinely interested in the happiness, and loveliness of other women.

Otherwise she never would have written: "Beauty is the touchstone of life. Without it we might as well live on the burnt-out Moon! So, for her own, for everybody's sake, it's every woman's duty to foster her beauty."

And then this famous English beauty who knows the importance of keeping her own exquisite skin as white and delicate as hepaticas in May, and who does it by bathing it in a delicious cleansing cream, tells other women how they, too, can keep their clear-skinned charm and freshness.

"EVERY woman," she says, "can have a fresh, undimmed complexion, a clear-skinned glow of health, if only she'll take care of her skin, devoting a little time each day to keeping it supple and protected. I know that she can beautifully and effectively accomplish this loveliness by the Pond's method, by using Pond's Two Creams."

These Two Creams made by Pond's which so perfectly rejuvenate the skin with their deep, refreshing cleansing and their delicate finish and protection, should be daily used as follows:

Every night before retiring, and during the day, especially after exposure to the weather, cleanse your face and neck with Pond's Cold Cream, patting it lavishly over your skin. Let it stay on long enough for its pure oils to seep down into your pores and bring to the surface the dust, dirt and powder which choke them.

Wipe off all the cream and dirt and repeat, closing the pores with a dash of cold water or a rub with ice. If your skin is inclined to dryness, after the nightly cleansing leave some of the cream on until morning.

After every cleansing with Pond's Cold Cream, except the bedtime one, finish and protect your skin with a delicate film of Pond's Vanishing Cream, smoothing on just a little. After this you'll find you can powder and rouge with far more success than before. For this cream is a perfect base for powder, holding it evenly, smoothly and long, and causing it to blend ever so naturally with rouge.

Pond's Vanishing Cream protects the skin, too, sparing it from hurtful soot and dust, wind and nipping cold—keeping it youthful, fresh, and supple for hours.

Pond's Cold Cream now comes in large jars and both Creams in two sizes of smaller jars and in tubes.

The Pillsbury Health Bran Prize Contest closes December 1, 1925—until then you have every chance to win one of the cash prizes which total

$1,000 in Gold

THE close of the Pillsbury Health Bran Contest is just around the corner. In a little while our committee of domestic scientists will decide upon the sixty-three housewives who will share $1,000 in gold. A few minutes spent in your kitchen—and at your desk—and your name may be among the winners! We want favorite recipes for bran muffins, bran bread, bran cookies, or novel ideas for serving Pillsbury's Health Bran in any form.

We wish to discover the many clever ways ingenious housewives are serving Pillsbury's Health Bran. We want you to give us a list of the five (5) best ways you know of using Pillsbury's Bran, either favorite recipes or original ways of serving it. To secure the best group of five suggestions, we are offering the following prizes:

$1,000 in PRIZES

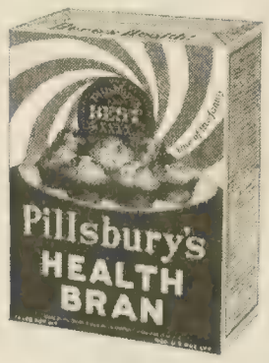
First Prize	$200
For each of the next six . . .	50
For each of the next six . . .	25
For each of the next twenty . .	10
For each of the next thirty . .	5

This contest will close Dec. 1, 1925 (entries must bear postmark not later than December 1). Winners will be announced in the Literary Digest Feb. 13 and by mail to all contestants. Three competent domestic scientists will make awards. In event of a tie, equal prizes will be given each tying contestant.



Read These Directions

Remember, 63 awards are offered for the best groups of five suggestions. You may submit as many groups as you desire but each group should consist of exactly five (5) suggestions, neither more nor less. Any of the five may be recipes containing Pillsbury's Health Bran or merely ideas for original uses. We want your ideas—literary merit is not required.

Write clearly on one side of the paper only, print your name and address plainly and mail to the Pillsbury Flour Mills Company, Dept. M, Minneapolis, Minn., before midnight, December 1. 1925.

Helpful Booklet Sent Free

To aid you, we will send you gratis an illustrated booklet on Pillsbury's Health Bran. And to every entrant we will send, after the close of the contest, a copy of Pillsbury's Cook Book illustrated in colors. Pillsbury Flour Mills Company, Minneapolis, U. S. A.

or wooden spoon; when it begins to turn white, add the stiffly beaten egg-white and vanilla. Continue working the fondant until it is smooth. Shape the fondant at once for dipping, and let the centers stand in a cold place and when the surface is dry dip them at once. This fondant softens upon standing and should be dipped as soon as possible. It is especially good for cream centers, as it becomes very soft as it ripens.

DECORATED FONDANT PATTIES

Melt one cup of plain fondant over hot water, stirring it enough to blend it. When it is melted, add coloring and flavoring, stirring as little as possible. One's own judgment will have to be used to determine the quantity of both coloring and flavoring. Select a small cylinder-shaped mold about the size of a fifty-cent piece (a very small baking-powder can will do). Dust the mold thoroughly with corn-starch so that the fondant will slip out easily. Pour the melted fondant into the mold. When the fondant is cold and firm, invert the mold, tap the bottom lightly and the fondant will slip out in a perfect shape. With a sharp knife cut the candy in slices one-fourth of an inch thick. The patties will be perfectly round.

The possibilities for decorating are unlimited. Thin circles of candied cherry, the edges overlapping, may be arranged as a border around the pattie, or it may be trimmed with a poinsettia, the petals of candied cherry, candied orange-peel for the center, with angelica or blanched pistachio-nuts for the green.

Large almonds, blanched and cut in strips, may be used in various ways. Chopped pistachio-nuts sprinkled over the surface of a pink pattie are attractive. Tiny candies of pastel shades may be pressed into the soft fondant. Decorations of tinted melted fondant or melted chocolate may be drawn on the patties with a toothpick.

BRICK TUTTI-FRUTTI

Divide one and one-half pounds of fondant into three equal parts. To the first add sliced candied cherries and flavor with vanilla. Knead this lightly and press it into a small lightly buttered loaf-pan.

To the second add candied pineapple and chopped blanched almonds. Tint a dainty green. Press over first. To the third add chopped pistachio-nuts and pink coloring. Put this over the second layer. When cold and firm, turn out and cover the entire surface with coating chocolate. Cut in slices, knead the fondant just enough to distribute the fruit, as long mixing with the fruit discolors the fondant. Fruit and nuts are more attractive if they are not chopped too small.

APRICOT SNOWBALLS

1 cup thick apricot purée
2/3 cup sugar
1 teaspoon lemon-juice

Combine ingredients and boil rapidly until mixture is thick and clear. Turn it into any small shallow mold, being sure the mixture is one inch thick. When firm, turn out on a board and cut in small circles. Roll each circle in shredded coconut.

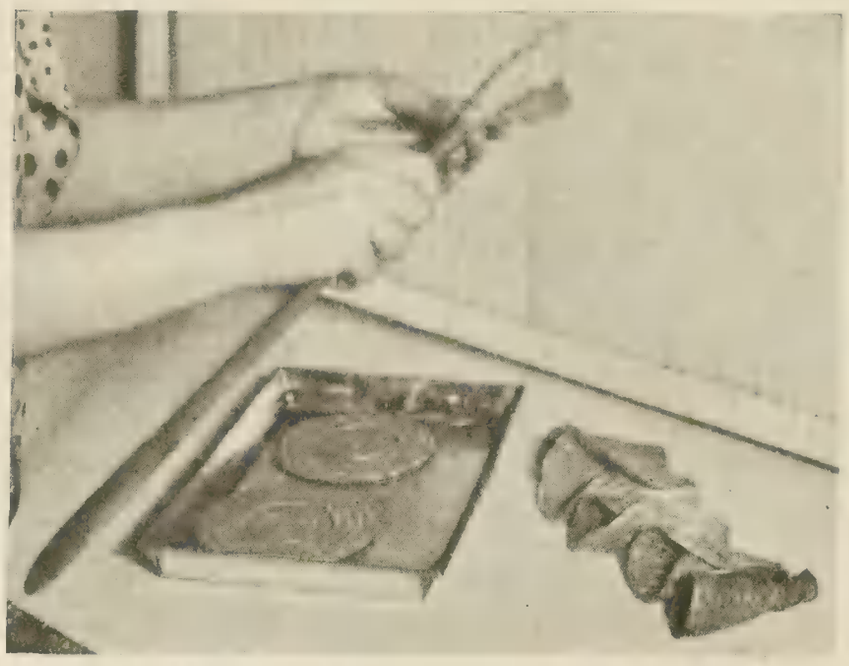
FRUIT-CAKE CONFECTIONS

Cut fruit-cake in small cubes or strips. Dip each shape into coating chocolate or melted fondant and drop it on waxed paper.

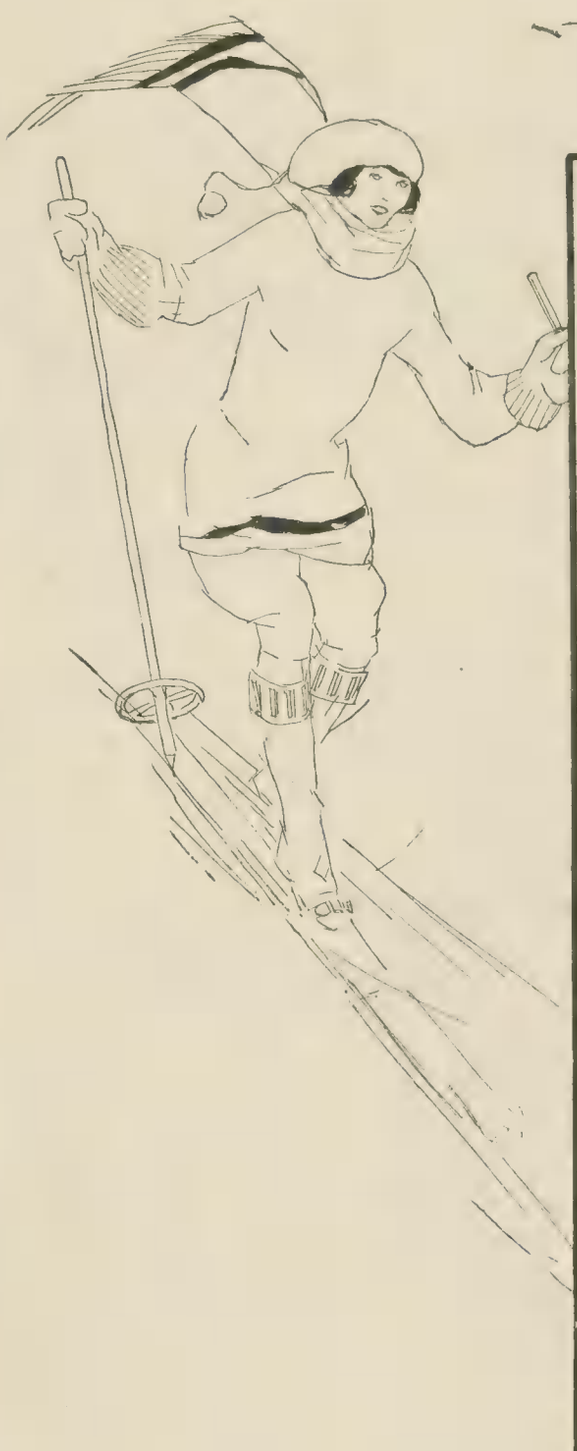
DARK FRUIT-CAKE

1 pound butter
1½ pounds brown sugar
1¼ pounds flour
10 eggs
1 cup molasses
1 cup strong coffee
Juice and grated rind of 2 oranges
Juice and grated rind of 1 lemon
1 cup tart jelly
¼ pound almonds
3 pounds raisins
2 pounds currants
1 pound citron
1 pound dates
2 teaspoons nutmeg
1 teaspoon mace
1 teaspoon cloves
2 teaspoons cinnamon
1 teaspoon soda
3 teaspoons baking-powder

Cream the butter and sugar. Add molasses, coffee, lemon, orange and jelly. Reserve one cup of flour in which to roll the fruit. Mix and sift dry ingredients, add to mixture, mix well and add well-beaten eggs. Add the floured fruit and mix thoroughly. Bake in greased paper-lined pans. Over the top of the cakes sprinkle the blanched shredded almonds. Cover the cakes with heavy waxed paper. Steam them two hours and bake in a moderate oven at 300 degrees Fahrenheit for one hour.



A Santa Claus of candied fruit, as sweet as he is jolly



CHOCOLATE WAFERS

½ cup butter
½ cup sugar
2 eggs
⅞ cup flour
½ teaspoon vanilla

Cream the butter, add sugar gradually, and the eggs beaten slightly, flour and flavoring. Drop by spoonfuls on a greased baking-sheet. Spread very thin in circular shapes about three inches in diameter. Bake in a slow oven at 280 degrees Fahrenheit until delicately browned. Remove from pan and roll at once over the handle of a wooden spoon. Let stand until cold. With a small stiff brush cover the surface with melted chocolate; roll the wafers in blanched chopped pistachio-nuts. Spread the wafer mixture with a bread-knife on a greased baking-sheet and creased in four-inch squares. When baked, cut the squares apart, roll in cornucopia shape and fill with divinity.

Cornucopias made of chocolate wafers are social successes

What a wonderful improvement in seeded raisins

In FLAVOR all the nectar of the Muscat grape!

In CONVENIENCE

Puffed Sun-Maids aren't sticky!

Your holiday fruit cakes, your steaming plum puddings—this year you can make them so much more easily, and better.

They call for seeded raisins as so many really fine dishes do. And now you can get seeded raisins that are really convenient to use! Seeded raisins with a new measure of goodness! Just ask your grocer for Puffed Sun-Maids.

Raisins from big, white Muscat grapes, these are. And by a patented Sun-Maid process their seeds are extracted without crushing the raisins or causing the juice to run. That gives you all their wonderful, natural flavor.

And it completely overcomes the old inconvenience of seeded raisins for, plump and whole, Puffed Sun-Maids do not stick together. They separate easily as they come out of the package.

For all your cooking you will find Puffed Sun-Maids the best and most convenient seeded raisins you ever used.

And on the table Christmas Day

For the Christmas bowl of raisins and nuts you will find Puffed Sun-Maids ideal—and much cheaper than cluster raisins.

WHAT FOOD FOR PARTIES?

By Flora M. Thurston

Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Director of the New York State College of Home Economics, Cornell University

NOWADAYS people are apt to forget that real hospitality consists in sharing. This is true especially in regard to food. Modern hostesses vie with one another in serving elaborately prepared dishes, and refreshments thus become the means of hospitality rather than its end.

If the refreshments served at an afternoon party are so abundant and rich that the home-maker who enjoys them has no interest in preparing dinner for her hungry husband and children when she returns home, surely her hostess has been thoughtless. When the guests at an evening entertainment are obliged to eat crab-meat and drink coffee in spite of the fact that crab makes them miserable and coffee keeps them awake all night, the hostess has obviously been inconsiderate. Although it is frequently necessary for parents to take their children to a social gathering in order to go themselves, there is seldom any provision made for either their entertainment or their refreshment.

Away from home, a home-maker can be counted upon to have a good appetite, because she is only too happy to taste some one else's cooking besides her own. Consequently a hostess, joyfully succumbing to the temptation to please her guests, may serve not a light repast but a hearty meal. Tuna-fish or chicken salad, cheese sticks, chocolate with whipped cream, frosted cake and ice-cream make a not unusual menu for such an occasion. In this case the refreshments are far from refreshing.

Most refreshments contain a high percentage of fat and sweets. Salads, especially those of meat, fish or poultry, are rich in material that slows down the passage of food after it has left the stomach. Cheese, whipped cream and chocolate, ice-cream and rich cakes, all favorites for fancy dishes, contain large amounts of fat. Refreshments are likely to be rich in sugar, a food notorious for taking the edge off the appetite and for contributing nothing but fuel to the body.

FOR AFTERNOON AND EVENING PARTIES

THE hostess who is clever enough to use her knowledge of nutrition to further the interests of hungry husbands and children as well as hospitality in general will send her guests home with a feeling of real refreshment that will whet their appetites for the evening meal. She will give them so much pleasure during the course of the afternoon that they will think of the food merely as an accessory or as one of many delightful incidents of the occasion.

In order to do this she will need to take into account the qualities that make food refreshing and the food needs of people late in the afternoon or evening when refreshments are usually served. The custom of serving food at these times has back of it more than a spirit of wanting to share with guests the best viands of the household.

Late in the afternoon, and particularly late in the evening, the body needs a thirst-quenching and refreshing drink and a limited amount of food to reduce fatigue.

As far as they satisfy this requirement, they are desirable, but when they load the system with more food than it needs, and especially when they upset the digestive tract, their use can not be justified.

The qualities to provide in refreshments are refreshing warmth in cold weather, coolness in hot weather, juiciness and acid. Foods following these requirements will tend to tone up the digestive tract, provide the necessary food and will not remain in the stomach too long nor detract from the appetite for the regular meal.

These qualities may be found in any of the following groups: (1) fruit salad, bread-and-butter sandwiches or wafers, tea, coffee or cocoa; (2) milk or fruit sherbet, simple cake and a beverage; (3) flavored ice-cream, wafers, fruit punch; (4) fruit beverages, wafers or simple cake. A thoughtful hostess will provide milk or cocoa for those who find tea or coffee too stimulating.

At first one may be afraid that one's hospitality has appeared to dwindle because the amount and variety of food seems limited. If the daintiness and attractiveness of service as well as other features of the occasion are emphasized, there will be an unconscious if not a conscious satisfaction in the simple repast and in the entire entertainment that has not been felt before.

Those who are not grown-ups and yet who are old enough to step out "of an evening" may have both need and desire for more substantial food. It should be readily digested, however, and never served with either coffee or tea. A husky appetite belonging to a growing child will greatly enjoy sandwiches made of marmalade, gingerbread, ginger cookies, fruit cookies or toast and jam served with milk or cocoa. A more formal repast might be fruit salad or dessert, with cheese crackers or simple cake and cocoa or milk. The little children who can not be left at home should always be provided for. Graham crackers or sponge-cake and milk are not too simple for them.

FOR THE CHILDREN'S PARTY

THE food that is served at children's parties should be given special consideration. For them between-meal refreshments tend to break up the day's routine and may seriously upset their digestion. If food is to be served at a children's party, it should take the place of the regular meal. It may be necessary to inquire of the parents what the guest child usually eats for dinner or supper in order to make the menu approximate the home meal. It is particularly important that no child be overfed or given food that is difficult to digest.

Some of the invited youngsters are likely to be overexcited, others may be very shy. Neither condition helps the stomach to handle food as it should, and for this reason there should not be too much variation from the usual diet. Quiet games just before the meal help to calm the boisterous and reassure the one who feels strange.

As in the social affairs of adults, food

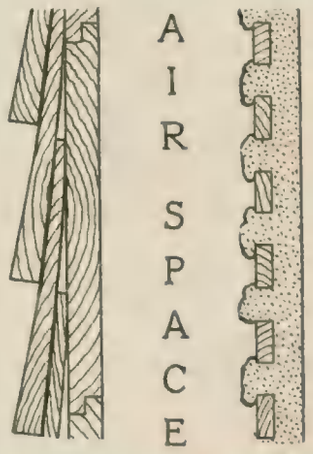
ESMOND



BLANKETS

Have you thought of giving Esmond blankets for Christmas—a practical gift that is welcome everywhere. They combine unusual beauty with unequaled service. When you buy Esmond blankets you buy beauty, comfort, warmth, wear and fast colors. They are moth-proof, easy to wash and are soft and beautiful after washing. Esmond colors and patterns are woven in and give a distinct decorative quality which makes these blankets unequaled in beauty and variety. They are made "2 in 1"—double warmth and single thickness.

All Esmond blankets—dainty baby blankets, blankets for the big bed, blanket comfortables, Indian and sport designs—show the Esmond ticket and Bunny trademark. Insist on Esmond—It means quality. At your favorite store, priced from $4 to $7 for you and from $1 to $4 for baby.

Through the centuries it has been proven that the double walled house is the only warm house—that an air space is necessary between the outer wall and the inner wall to retain the warmth in the house and keep the cold out. All good houses are insulated with an air space between the outer and inner walls. This is also the Esmond process of Blanket manufacture.

Send 10c for Esmond Doll Blanket. It will please your children and show what Esmond Quality is. The story of Bunny Esmond for children, free on request.

Esmond Blankets are woven two-in-one—two walls with an air space between.

Esmond Blankets are single blankets with the warmth of a pair. In the Esmond process, only one side of the yarn is fuzzed which makes the Esmond stronger, besides warmer, than a blanket made in the ordinary way with only one strand fuzzed on both sides. All Esmond Blankets have the air space between—it is the Esmond process.

WHAT FOOD FOR PARTIES?

should not become the center of interest. It should be very simple, prepared in novel shapes and served in attractive containers to make it enticing. A single dish of unusual charm may be quite enough to give gaiety to the meal, if the table is decorated and the napkins are bright.

If the children are accustomed to these foods or similar ones for dinner or supper, the following menu might be used: Clear or creamed vegetable soup with animal crackers, or cereal with top milk and brown sugar or raisins if desired, milk or cocoa with straws, whole-wheat and lettuce sandwiches (very little salad dressing or none), ice-cream, sherbet or gelatin in color or shapes, sponge-cake or cookies in shapes if desired.

FOR THE COMMUNITY PARTY

ONE of the most popular types of recreation is the community "get-together," when the whole family comes to spend the day, bringing a basket lunch or a donation for a hot meal. If the community is a rural one, the families will begin to arrive before noon and very shortly the kitchen of the community hall will be full of bustling housewives in neat aprons unpacking baskets and boxes and spreading their delicious contents on long board tables. A social occasion of this kind is a rare opportunity for each family to express its feeling of hospitality to all its neighbors and for the community as a whole to welcome newcomers into its companionship.

From the abundance and the delectable appearance of the meal, one might guess that all the hospitality was expected to be expressed via food, and unfortunately sometimes this is the case. Too often there is much less time and effort spent in promoting informal sociability than in preparing and serving the food, and there is the danger of feeling that the only object in sitting at the table is to eat.

How much more enjoyable would the meal become if the tables were small enough to permit group visiting and if there were a host and hostess at every one! If this could be arranged, the necessity of placing the serving-dishes on the tables and letting every person help himself could be avoided. The host and hostess might serve in family style and so make unnecessary the continuous passing of serving-dishes from person to person, a practise that puts an end to conversation. If there is enough help in the kitchen, each plate might be served before bringing it to the table. This facilitates the service and may be a desirable compromise where the number of people is so large that a "second table" must be provided for. No effort should be spared to introduce every one at the table and to make the meal a real social experience. Table games start the ball of good fellowship rolling.

Most urgent of all is the need for a children's table where they can be given food that has been specially provided for them. If some one who understands children can take charge, these occasions may prove to be much-needed experiences for the shy child who plays alone and for the noisy one who needs to consider his neighbors.

And now for the meal itself, what shall it be? The simplest way to plan it, which is really no plan at all, is to let every one bring whatever he wishes. This usually results in a handsome array of the most delicious cakes of every description, many kinds of pie, cookies, doughnuts, sandwiches, meat loaves, baked beans, scalloped potatoes and cabbage salad. Unless the community has been exposed to some kind of education in nutrition, the bread is almost invariably white and the desserts make up the largest part of the array.

Although the dishes may be deliciously prepared and attractive to see, they represent merely a collection of food and not a meal that has been planned according to the nutritive needs of the occasion. Since every one brings what he fancies most, there may be duplication in the kind of food. If one could depend upon the intelligence and the will power of the guests to choose a wholesome meal from the procession of dishes that pass through their hands, there would be no need for concern; but when each platter is more alluring than the one before, who can refrain from sampling them all? It is unfortunate also that the foods do not vary at different seasons and that they include a very limited amount and variety of vegetables, fruit and whole-cereal products. Many forms of the same kind of food do not add to its value, but rather tempt one beyond resistance to eat the food for its own sake.

The most successful meals are those that are planned to express the home-maker's skill both in preparation and in selection. Merely enough food is not sufficient. To have a satisfying and healthful meal there should be enough, but not too much, of the most wholesome foods, and the "treats" should assume a minor place.

If the food is to be cooked before leaving home, the menu will have certain limitations. It must be the type of food that will carry well and that will not suffer by being heated again if necessary. The menu must be varied enough to allow for differences in taste, and it must be made up of foods that are generally popular. If the meal is to be a dinner, it will probably include meat, potatoes and another vegetable or salad or both, dessert and a beverage. Soup, if it contains sufficient vegetables, could be served in place of another vegetable dish or a fruit cocktail may be served at the beginning of the meal and the salad omitted, if scarcity of dishes or service does not make them impossible.

The person or, better still, the committee in charge of the menu should decide whether each person should be asked to bring a type of food, such as dessert, or a specific food, such as cabbage salad. There is much more satisfaction in a definite menu; but if there are separate tables, one kind of dessert or salad might be placed on one table and another variety on another table. There is a certain value in letting each one choose from the menu what she will bring, because every housewife knows which are her best products.

The menu will need to vary with the season. In Autumn, if the flocks are being culled, chicken pie might be the main dish of the meal, and with it might go scalloped potato, squash, cabbage-and-pineapple salad, whole-wheat bread and butter, prune pudding, coffee and milk.

In Winter one might prefer a heartier meal of ham en casserole, baked with apple or served with apple sauce, creamed potato, string-bean salad, whole-wheat biscuit and butter, raisin pie, coffee and milk.

In Spring, when the appetite is likely to be a bit jaded, a clear vegetable soup or fruit cocktail will have a stimulating effect. This might be followed by veal cutlet, mashed potatoes, baked tomato, whole-wheat sandwiches, peach cobbler, coffee and milk.

An early Summer menu might include fresh asparagus on toast, browned potatoes, egg or fish salad, bran muffins and butter, ice-cream with fresh strawberries, iced tea and milk.

ARE YOUR PARTIES SANE?

Sumptuous desserts, too rich for comfort or the waistline, aren't fashionable any more. Let's serve meals that are light and easily digested, delicious but not fattening

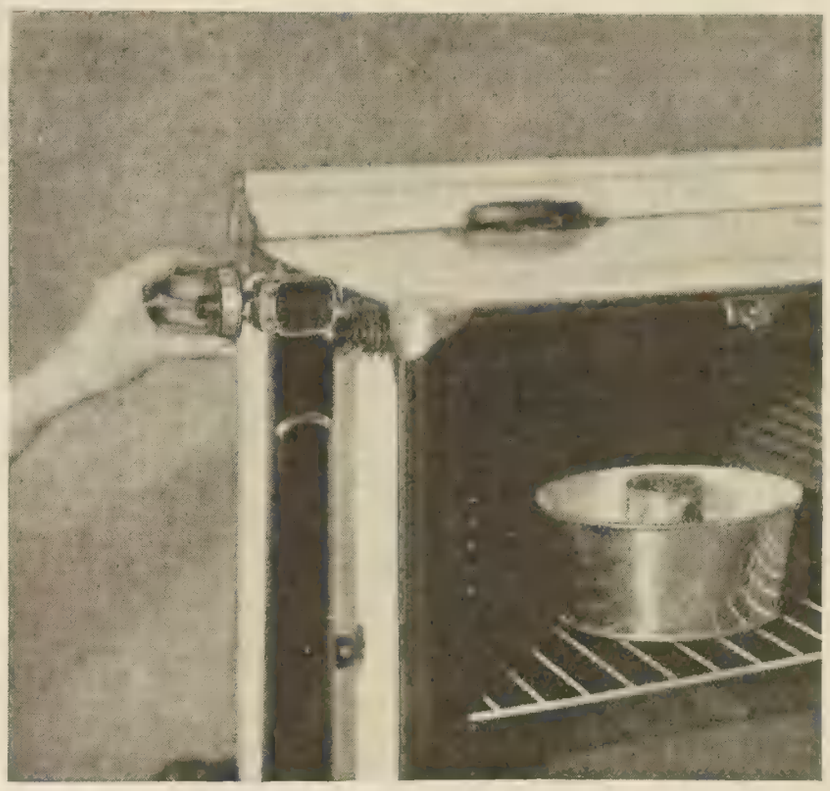
HOW HOT AND HOW LONG?



By Lucile Brewer

WHAT TEMPERATURE?

How hot an oven do you have for pie-crust? For roast chicken? For pudding or cookies?

THE DELINEATOR temperature chart gives you the right temperatures for every food—for baking, roasting, frying and broiling. You will find it one of the handiest of kitchen helps, and it costs you nothing but a two-cent stamp for return postage. Just address the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

A controlled cake indeed! Baked at 250 degrees Fahrenheit for ten minutes and then at 300 degrees for an hour, sponge-cake is always successful

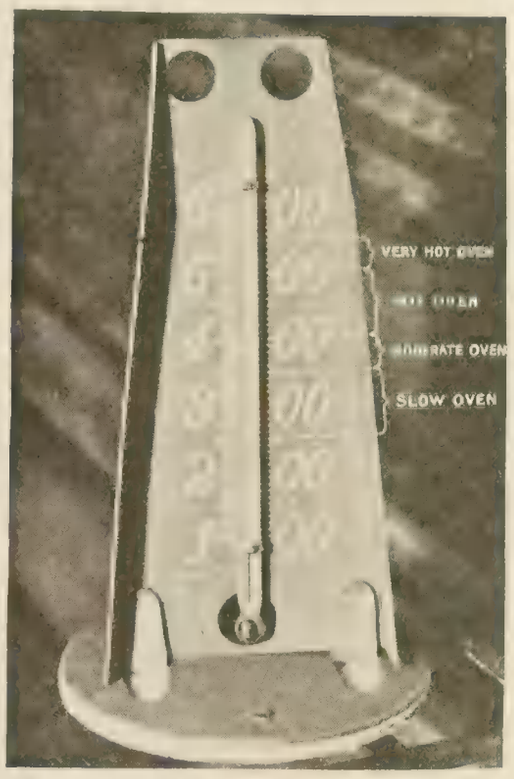
THE indefinite directions given by some of the best authorities, the great variation in rules and the real lack of understanding of the meaning of the usual terms "hot," "medium," "slow," as applied to baking temperatures, point to the need of standardizing temperatures in cooking.

Practically every one agrees that certain foods, as custards and soufflés, should be cooked in a "slow" oven. Sponge-cake and angel-food need a moderate oven, while other dishes, such as meat, popovers, bread and pastry, require a hot oven to begin with. But, says the housekeeper, what is a slow or a hot or a medium oven? We must urge her to gain her knowledge of this through using a thermometer in her oven.

She can gain much help by learning the type of dishes which should be cooked at various temperatures.

To aid her the following selection has been made as nearly as possible in the order of temperature required, beginning with the lowest.

Custards—Baked custards and custard mixtures should cook at a low temperature to insure smooth, velvety texture. Too fast cooking may make the product whey or separate. The dish containing a custard mixture should be set in a pan of hot but not boiling water and the temperature of the oven should be kept at 250 to 350 degrees Fahrenheit for thirty to thirty-five minutes Dishes of the baked-custard type are: timbales, bread-puddings, soufflés.



Meringues—There are two types of meringues—those which are dried out to serve as cakes and called kisses, and those which are used to top puddings and pies. Meringues should first bake at a low temperature—250 degrees Fahrenheit—for thirty minutes. At the end of this period the heat should be increased to 280 degrees Fahrenheit and kept there for about thirty minutes or until the meringue is delicately colored and firm. For pies and puddings a good meringue is of delicate texture and more appetizing if lightly browned. A low temperature is necessary, as too much heat will cause the meringue to become tough, to shrink and liquefy. Too low a temperature may cause the same result. The best temperature for this type of meringue is 300 degrees Fahrenheit, and the time about twenty to twenty-five minutes.

Sponge-Cake and Angel-Food—The baking of these cakes is of the utmost importance to their success. The temperature at the beginning should be low enough to allow the mixture partially to expand before it begins to brown. The heat should then be increased to prevent a coarse, porous texture. If the mixture bakes too rapidly so that a crust forms over the top, expansion can not take place, the cake is close in texture, heavy and tough, and the crust may crack. Begin by baking at 250 degrees Fahrenheit for ten minutes, then increase to 300 degrees Fahrenheit and bake one hour.

Fruit-Cake and Four-Pound Cake—This type of cake burns easily and should be baked at a low temperature. The most successful as well as the simplest method is to steam the cake first and then bake it. For fruit-cake steam two and a half hours, then bake one and a half hours at 250 degrees Fahrenheit. Large pound-cakes may be steamed one and a half hours and then baked one-half to one hour at 250 degrees Fahrenheit.

Bread—The baking is as important as any of the other processes involved in bread-making. The baking should begin in a hot oven, then the temperature should be gradually decreased. The length of time for baking depends on the size of the loaf. For a medium loaf—that is, a pound and a half to

Star-Points of a Fine Roaster

The Shape—A right-little, tight-little round roaster. Ideal for small roast or small oven. And good for a dozen other things besides roasting.

The Material—Hardest aluminum. Dense and tough—and very thick. The kind of metal that makes all Mirro utensils durable and amazingly economical.

The Cover—Solid and strong. Stays snug in fit after years of hard work. Open the ventilator for browning; close for steaming.

The Tray—Shaped as it should be—with generous cut-outs for handy basting. No sharp edges. No hard-to-clean places. As substantial as the roaster itself.

The Handles—Large and easy to take hold of. Heavily tinned—no rusting. Firmly fastened with big, smooth rivets.

READ in the stars the solid worth and faithful serviceability of a typical Mirro utensil . . . . One of these days, perhaps, you will be tempted by a trifling saving to buy a piece of some poor and flimsy ware. Then stop and remember the stars. Remember that Mirro costs less by the year—that you can proudly own "The Finest Aluminum" and still be saving money all the while.

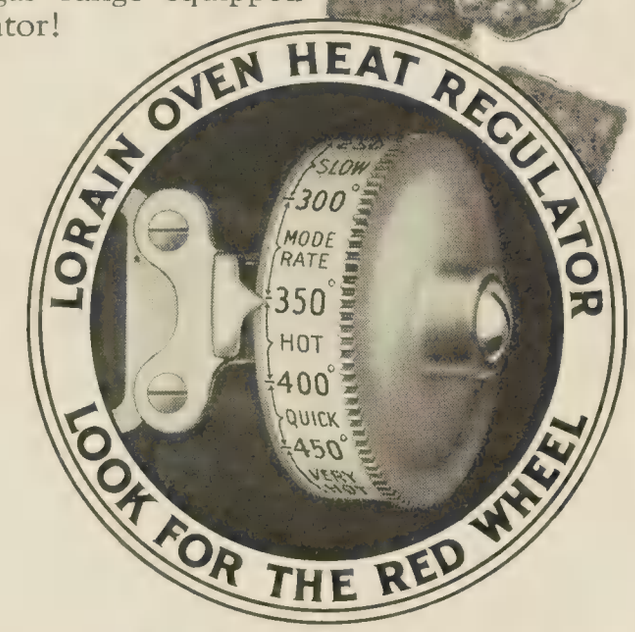
"'Twas the night before Christmas —and all through the house not a creature was stirring," except Mother. Mother knew the joy of placing beneath the tree some wholesome goodies for the children.

To be sure, it was a queer time to be making cookies. But this particular Mother, like thousands of other housewives, owned a gas range equipped with a Lorain Oven Heat Regulator and, therefore, she knew all the short-cuts of Cookery.

Two days before, she had made the cooky dough. Then on Christmas Eve all she had to do was to cut out the cookies, place them in the oven, set the Red Wheel at a given temperature, and after a few minutes remove them.

On Christmas Day this same Mother will put a whole Turkey Dinner in the Lorain Self-Regulating Oven at nine in the morning; then she'll play with the children until 1:00 p. m., when the deliciously cooked dinner will be ready to serve. And—next Summer she'll can all her fruits by the new Lorain Oven Method.



What a great and glorious Christmas Gift for any Mother—an all-white-enameled gas range equipped with the Lorain Oven Heat Regulator!

Dealers and Gas Companies everywhere will gladly demonstrate the Lorain Self-regulating Oven. Many of them sell Lorain-equipped Gas Ranges on easy, time payments. A few may try to sell you something else not nearly so good. So insist on a gas range that has a Red Wheel Regulator. That is the "Lorain"—the Original.

Lorain is an Oven Heat Regulator but—all heat regulators are not Lorain. There is only one "RED WHEEL LORAIN". Accept no other.

One easy turn of the Lorain Red Wheel gives you a choice of any measured and controlled oven heat for any kind of oven cooking or baking.

HOW HOT AND HOW LONG?

two pounds—begin by baking at 400 degrees Fahrenheit for fifteen minutes, then decrease to 350 degrees Fahrenheit and bake for forty-five minutes longer.

Gingerbread is best baked in a shallow pan with the dough about one inch thick. Begin baking at 360 degrees Fahrenheit for about ten minutes, then increase slightly to 380 degrees Fahrenheit and bake for about twenty minutes longer.

Plain Cake—Many failures in cake-making may be caused by poor baking. Too low a temperature at the beginning will allow the cake to rise or expand too much and will give a coarse texture, and if the heat is not increased at the proper time the cake may fall. If the temperature is too high at the beginning, the top will brown before the mass has risen enough, so that when the heat reaches the center of the loaf and this part of the cake rises it will break the surface, which gives a cracked product as well as one with an uneven texture. Begin by baking at 380 degrees Fahrenheit for ten minutes, then increase heat to 390 degrees Fahrenheit and bake for thirty-five to fifty minutes longer. This includes the rank and file of moderately rich butter cakes.

Cookies—Chocolate, molasses and fruit cookies burn easily and should be baked more slowly. Rolled cookies require a temperature of 400 degrees Fahrenheit for ten to fifteen minutes; while drop-cookies should have from 350 to 400 degrees Fahrenheit for fifteen to twenty minutes.

Steaks just brown enough outside and succulent enough inside are assured in a regulated oven

Rolls, Baking-Powder Biscuit, Muffins and Corn-Bread should be baked in a hot oven ranging from 400 to 450 degrees Fahrenheit for fifteen to twenty-five minutes.

Popovers should begin baking at 450 degrees Fahrenheit for twenty minutes or until puffed; then the heat should be decreased to 350 degrees Fahrenheit and the baking continued for approximately twenty-five minutes longer.

Pies—Double-crust pies with uncooked filling, as apple, cherry or berry, require a relatively high temperature—that is, 450 degrees Fahrenheit—for the first ten minutes to bake the crust and prevent it from shrinking from the edges of the pan. Heat should then be decreased to 350 degrees Fahrenheit for the remainder of the period to cook the fruit. In all bake about one hour. For one-crust or open pies, as pumpkin or custard, the temperature is at the beginning about the same as for double-crust pies—that is, 450 degrees Fahrenheit—for the first ten minutes. It is necessary to complete the baking of pumpkin or custard at a low temperature—that is, at 300 to 325 degrees Fahrenheit—to secure a firm, smooth, unseparated product. In all bake about one hour.

Pastry, as pastry shells or strips, requires a hot oven—that is, a temperature of 500 degrees Fahrenheit—in the beginning to set the pastry quickly. This keeps the pastry from shrinking and consequently losing its shape.

Casseroles—In genuine casserole cooking the materials used are always uncooked. This is an excellent way to use the tougher, cheaper cuts of meat, which make attractive, palatable dishes. The outside of the meat must be seared quickly so that the juices be retained. The food is then put in the casserole and the cooking continued at a temperature of 300 degrees Fahrenheit two and a half to three hours, more or less, the time depending on whether meat is used and the time required to make it tender. If grated cheese is a part of the dish, the heat must be low enough to melt the cheese and give a smooth, creamy product—400 degrees Fahrenheit for twenty to twenty-five minutes will usually be about right for casserole dishes containing cheese.

Meat and Poultry—At no point in baking is a definite temperature of greater importance than in the cooking of meats. Maintaining the right temperature tends to insure uniformity of texture throughout, lessened waste, and produces a perfectly cooked, juicy product. The most difficult meats to cook are the kinds usually served rare. After searing, beef is cooked a shorter time than pork, lamb, veal or poultry, which should be cooked until done, the exception being Spring lamb, which is sometimes served rare.

Searing temperature for all meats is 500 degrees Fahrenheit for a time long enough thoroughly to sear the entire surface. Then reduce the temperature to 400 degrees Fahrenheit for the remaining time, which varies as follows:

Beef (rare), 10 minutes for each lb.
Beef (medium), 12 minutes for each lb.
Beef (well done), 15 minutes for each lb.
Poultry, 20 minutes for each lb.
Lamb, 20 minutes for each lb.
Veal, 25 minutes for each lb.
Pork (well done), 30 minutes for each lb.

Scalloped Dishes—Most scalloped dishes are made from cooked food, and therefore require a short baking period, the length of time depending upon what materials are used and whether the liquid or sauce added is hot or cold. The oven should be hot enough to heat the food thoroughly and brown the top, which may or may not be covered with crums, plain or buttered. Bake for twenty to twenty-five minutes at a temperature of from 400 to 425 degrees Fahrenheit.

How this supreme Kitchen-test actually cuts baking failures right in half!

Now . . . no matter how inexperienced . . . you can bake just as delicious dishes as any one of your neighbors—every time you bake

OFTEN the same brand of flour does not always bake the same way in your oven. Undoubtedly you have noticed this.

It is the direct cause of more than one-half of all baking failures!

Not because the flour is bad. But simply because—although always the same chemically—a brand of flour may still differ in baking results each time.

So a miller has only one way of being sure that his flour will always act the same for you. By Kitchen-testing a sample from every batch. By baking with it himself.

That's what we do with all Gold Medal Flour. We Kitchen-test samples from each batch. Before any of it is allowed to enter your home.

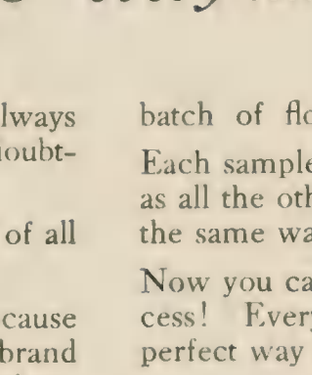
Perfect baking results—always

We have a kitchen just like yours. Each morning we receive samples of each batch of Gold Medal Flour milled. Betty Crocker and her staff bake with them.

We bake biscuits, cookies, doughnuts, pastries of every kind. Simply everything. If a sample does not bake exactly right—that batch of flour is never allowed to reach you.

Each sample must bake in the same perfect way as all the others. That means every sack will act the same way for you.

Now you can bake with a light heart. Sure of success! Every sack of this fine flour acts the same perfect way in your oven. We guarantee it.



This is our guarantee to you—

Two million women now use only Gold Medal Flour for all their baking.

But if you have never tried it, do this. Order a sack from your grocer and try it out as much as you please.

If it does not give you the most uniform good results of any flour you have ever tried—you may at any time return the unused portion of your sack of flour to your grocer. He will pay you back your full purchase price. We will repay him.

Eventually—every woman will use only Kitchen-tested flour. It is the one way you can be sure every sack will always act the same way in your oven. Why not now?

Why Not Now?

SLICED PEACHES & CREAM

that's just one way to enjoy this wonderful fruit treat

Everybody likes sliced peaches. In their own rich syrup, they're as fine a treat as it's possible to serve.

But if you have only tried Del Monte Sliced Peaches this one way, you are missing a great many other menu combinations you would surely enjoy. Sliced peaches make scores of other old favorites into real masterpieces—and do it without a bit of extra fuss or bother.

For a few every-day examples, try adding them to tapioca or bread pudding—between hot biscuits as a shortcake—in peach betty—on breakfast cereals—or as a "pick-up" salad with cottage cheese. In each of these suggestions there is a new touch of healthfulness—a sure appetite appeal.

But however you serve them, make sure of their quality. Insist on Del Monte. Then you know in advance exactly what you're getting—the same dependable goodness and flavor, the same certainty of satisfaction—no matter when or where you buy.

"The Del Monte Fruit Book" has many suggestions for the service of sliced peaches. Send for free copy. Address Dept. 28M, California Packing Corporation, San Francisco.

CURTAIN-RAISERS

Dishes that Introduce the Dinner

Adapted from the Butterick Cook Book

Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Director of the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University

ALTHOUGH strict convention in England and America at one time decreed that the formal dinner should begin with soup, that custom is no longer binding even in the most formal household. Other dishes to introduce the dinner have crept in, and because of their savory qualities have found ready and general acceptance; appetizers, they are usually called. Sometimes they are referred to as relishes and hors-d'œuvres, because they are often a glorified edition of the old side-dish now given a conspicuous place as a separate course by itself.

The appetizer must be made from foods that have distinct, piquant flavor and appetite-whetting qualities. Pickled and salted foods, olives and pickles, vinegar and fruit-acids, peppers, pepper and paprika, grapefruit, melons and fruit cocktails, canapés (fried bread), and small sandwiches spread with mixtures of sardines, anchovies and caviar or lobster and crabmeat, pâté de foies gras, cheese, olives or other mixtures of high flavor, deviled eggs, small salads, may all be included in the list of appetizers.

The appetizer should always be on the table when the meal is announced. A single portion is served to each person, and if substantial foods are used the portions should be small, as the purpose of this course is to whet but not to satisfy the appetite. The following recipes are by no means inclusive of all the dishes that can serve as the introductory course. The imaginative hostess may permit her fancy to soar untrammeled, and may set before her guests very racy, interesting bits of food involving unusual and savory combinations.

OYSTER OR CLAM COCKTAIL

30 medium oysters
2 teaspoons prepared horseradish
3 tablespoons tomato catchup
1 teaspoon salt
2 tablespoons vinegar
4 tablespoons lemon-juice
¼ teaspoon tabasco sauce

Where fresh oysters are obtainable, they are usually served on the half-shell, on a plate of crushed ice, around a small glass holding the cocktail mixture. When it is not possible to get the oysters in the shell, cocktails may be served in ice-shells made for this purpose, or in cases made from green pepper shells, in halves of grapefruit, or in large claret glasses. Put five medium oysters into each glass and pour the dressing over them. To make the dressing, mix horseradish, tomato catchup and vinegar. lemon-juice and tabasco sauce, and salt thoroughly. Both oysters and dressing should be very cold.

PREPARED BREAD FOR CANAPÉS

Canapés are made from stale white bread, cut in quarter-inch slices and then shaped with a cutter into circles or rings two and one-half or three inches in diameter, or cut into squares, strips, triangles or other fancy shapes. These portions of bread are then either fried in deep fat and drained on absorbent paper or sautéd in just enough butter or other fat to keep them from burning; or they may be toasted or set in the oven until they turn a delicate brown; then cover them with the mixture preferred.

SARDINE CANAPÉS

6 portions prepared bread
Juice 1 lemon
Salt
6 large olives
6 large sardines
Worcestershire sauce
Pickled beets

Remove skin and backbone. Flake the sardines with a fork and season with lemon-juice, salt and a few drops of Worcestershire sauce. Spread the prepared bread with this mixture and decorate by placing in the center of each canapé a small circle of pickled beet. Cut a slice from the end of a large olive so that it will stand firmly and place this in the center of the beet.

PÂTÉ-DE-FOIES-GRAS CANAPÉS

3 tablespoons pâté-de foies-gras paste or 2 fowls' livers, mashed to paste
Salt
6 portions prepared bread
¼ cup cream
Cayenne pepper

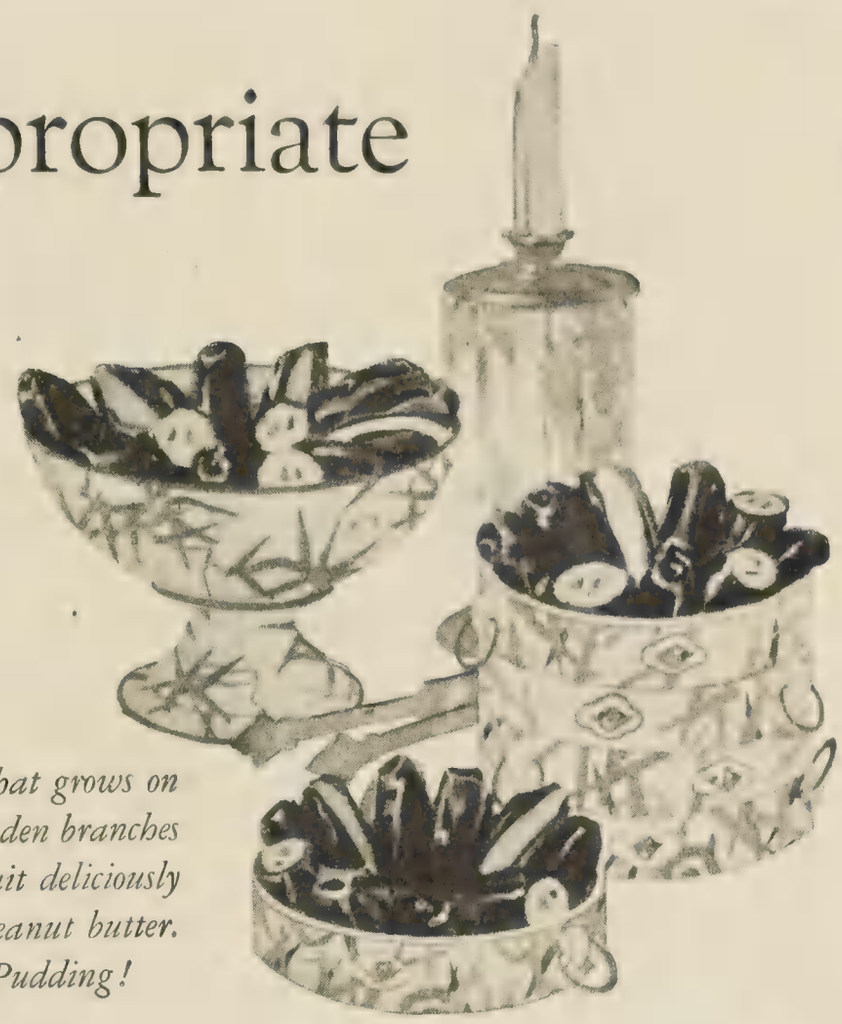
Add the cream and seasoning to the paste. Mash through a fine sieve and spread on portions of fried bread. Garnish with parsley or decorate in any way desired.

GRAPEFRUIT ON THE HALF-SHELL

3 grapefruits
Sugar

Cut grapefruit in halves. With a pair of sharp shears cut a circular piece from the center of each half of grapefruit, being careful not to cut through the skin. This is best accomplished by cutting each piece of fiber first, and then slipping the shears under the center and cutting through the tough center and lifting it out. Then with a sharp knife separate each section of grapefruit from the membrane and skin. Sprinkle with sugar and set in the ice-box to chill. The edges of the grapefruit skin may be pinked if desired. The pieces of membrane between the sections of fruit may be cut away and removed, leaving the shell filled with only edible portions of the fruit.

Grapefruit may be served without ice or in special grapefruit glasses embedded in ice for breakfast, dinner, or luncheon.



HALF THE ZEST

of an appetizer lies in its novelty. If you want to keep your family interested, change from canapé to cocktail (of course we mean the fruit and fish variety!), from cocktail to little salads. We can tell you how to make more of these piquant appetizers. Send a note with a two-cent stamp for return postage to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and ask for "Tasty Hors-d'oeuvres"

Dates are especially appropriate for Christmas

as fruit, confection and nourishing food

A package of dates (children call dates "the candy that grows on trees") hangs by a bright red ribbon from the heavy-laden branches of the Evergreen. In the candy bowls you find this fruit deliciously stuffed—with marshmallow and nuts, fondant or peanut butter. And dates again to enrich the Christmas Plum Pudding!

DATES fit into the scheme of things at Christmas time when confections and party-dainties must be delicious. But more than this, dates are nourishing food.

And women are understanding more about foods today. Especially in families where there are growing children, food is prepared both to supply and maintain the needs of the body.

Christmas Stuffings for Dates

Dates are the Christmas candy easiest to prepare, good to eat and actually good for you. Let the children have all the dates they want. Stuffings of quartered marshmallows, peanut butter or nuts are simple, easily digested foods. Dip the stuffed dates in powdered sugar or Dromedary Cocoanut. Have plenty of stuffed dates in the house—for everyone.

After pitting dates, fill some with soft cream cheese. Then dip the stuffed dates in snow-white cocoanut. This is the favorite.

Stuff dates with orange and nut. Chop very fine half a cup of English walnuts. Add three tablespoonfuls of confectioner's sugar and the grated rind of half an orange. Moisten with orange juice. Stuff the pitted dates with this tasty filling.

Party Sandwiches

Boston brown bread, graham and nut bread are especially good for date sandwiches—and especially nutritious.

Sprinkle Dromedary Cocoanut over chopped dates and cream cheese—for graham bread.

Try pimento-filled olives and dates on white bread.

Try pimento cheese and dates, half and half, seasoning with salt, paprika and a few drops of lemon juice.

Dates are a natural food as are all the fruits and vegetables that we eat in the same general form in which they are taken from soil and trees. Instinctively we seem to know that we should eat all of them we can. And the reasons are not difficult to understand.

Certain foods that absorb the healthful rays of the sun and the strength of the rich, brown earth are later refined—robbed of important food values—during the process of preparation for your table.

But dates come to you just as they are harvested. Their golden color is imprisoned sunlight. And just as human beings find new health and happiness in the sun, so foods that develop under its kindly rays, are made rich in body-building elements.

Dates are nourishing

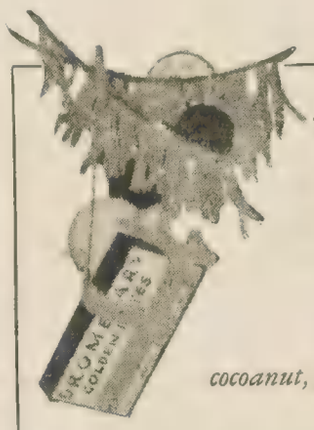
Most women today realize the need of thoughtful eating. They look for foods that retain the constructive properties on which our bodies depend.

The date, for instance, has a remarkable content of digestible fruit sugar, which is immediately absorbed by the body as energy. Most of the everyday sweets that we eat are not the natural, easily-absorbed sweets—and so there is danger of excess. But not with dates.

And in contrast to many sugar-foods, the date contains protein for tissue-building. The date, also, is recognized for its mineral content. Calcium, one of the important minerals, is the essential food for bone and teeth—iron, as you know, is nature's tonic.

All this does not mean that the date is perfect. It is doubtful whether any one food is nutritionally perfect. Dates are simply an unusually well-balanced food, pleasant to taste and within the means of all. Let the recipes here help you enjoy dates a new way.

Oriental Plum Pudding



Plum puddings suggest the romance of Old England. There, plum puddings are often made a year ahead of the serving, wrapped in cloths and left in a dry, cool place. Without the fuss or ceremony of an English plum pudding, you can make a delicacy for Christmas dinner, by following this recipe for Oriental plum pudding.

To 1 cup finely chopped beef suet add 1 cup halved, seeded raisins, 1½ cups dates, stoned and quartered, ¾ cup mixed Dromedary citron, orange and lemon peels—also ½ cup Dromedary cocoanut, 1 grated lemon rind, 1 cup stale bread crumbs and 1 cup brown sugar. Add 1 cup sifted flour, ⅔ teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon ground cinnamon, ½ teaspoon ground cloves and ½ grated nutmeg. Moisten all with 6 well beaten eggs and 1 cup grape juice. Mix and turn into 2 well greased molds. Cover closely. Steam at least 6 hours.

Black Eyed Susan Salad

Peel seedless oranges, removing all skin and membrane. Each portion is made by opening up the sections of the orange to resemble the petals of a flower. The salad picture shows this. Two or three sliced dates are then added, with either mayonnaise or boiled dressing used for the garnishing.

There is more about dates in a new cook book called "Foods from Sunny Lands." It has a hundred delights, made with Dromedary dates, cocoanut, grapefruit and figs. Write for it today. Just clip the coupon.

What the teachers told me about your children

By Carrie Blanchard

RECENTLY I sent a letter to a thousand teachers. I asked them particularly about their attitude toward the use of coffee and tea by their pupils.

Ninety-nine and one-half per cent. said they considered coffee and tea definitely harmful, not only to children, but to themselves. They traced definite bad effects to the use of coffee and tea by their pupils. Thirty-four per cent. mentioned "dullness in school work"; thirty-one per cent. "nervousness"; and eleven per cent. "stunting of physical as well as mental development."

The teachers prompted this suggestion

Certainly it would be difficult to find any group of people more in agreement on any subject.

"I think the first step in getting children to stop drinking coffee is to reach the parents. This is a rather difficult thing to do without seeming to interfere." So one teacher wrote. I mention what she said because this same thought ran through hundreds of the letters I received.

This prompts me to come direct to you, the mothers, with a suggestion. Schools all over the country are turning to Instant Postum, made in the new way with hot milk instead of boiling water, as the ideal hot drink to serve with the noonday lunch. Teachers are enthusiastic about it! It is easy to prepare—just hot milk poured over Instant Postum in the cup, and stirred a moment.

And it is so splendidly suited to children's needs! A hot drink, containing all the nourishment of milk, plus the wholesome elements of wheat and bran. Children immediately like Postum made with milk—even those who don't care for milk alone. And there is no more fretting for "the drink father gets."

When teachers are willing to give their time so freely to health education, it seems to me that we mothers should do our very best to put this teaching into practice. Make a test of this plan! Please accept my offer—now!

Carrie Blanchard's Offer

I want you to make a thirty-day test of Postum. I will give you one week's supply of Postum, free, and my personal directions for preparing it, to start you on this test.

Or if you wish to begin the test today, get Postum at your grocer's. It costs much less—only one-half cent a cup.

For one week's free supply, please send me your name and address, indicating whether you want Instant Postum (this is the kind prepared instantly in the cup with either boiling water or hot milk, and the only kind which can be made with hot milk) or Postum Cereal, the kind you boil.

Postum is one of the Post Health Products, which include also Grape-Nuts, Post Toasties (Double-thick Corn Flakes), and Post's Bran Flakes. Your grocer sells Postum in two forms. Instant Postum, made in the cup by adding boiling water, is one of the easiest drinks in the world to prepare. Postum Cereal is also easy to make, but should be boiled 20 minutes.

Oysters, salt-water fish and clams will put iodin into your food and help to protect you from simple goiter

SEA FISH, SEA-MOSS, SEA-SALT

How to Get Your Iodin in the Daily Menu

By Flora M. Thurston

Edited and approved by the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University—Martha Van Rensselaer

DO YOU LIVE IN THE GOITER BELT?

Goiter brings with it nervousness, takes away energy and initiative, and depletes your store of health. If you live in any part of the large goiter belt, which includes more than half the United States, you must be particularly careful.

Physicians have established the value of iodin as a goiter preventive. They advise us to include certain foods in our diet regularly—foods that contain iodin.

This article gives you a complete list of the substances that should be in your diet if you wish to avoid faulty thyroid secretion and all its attendant ills. If you want recipes for preparing them, write to the Home-Making Department of The Delineator, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y. Our leaflet "Introducing Iodin" tells you how to prepare fish, and gives you recipes for delectable dishes of sea-moss and other iodin-bearing foods. Send a two-cent stamp for return postage—please.

CIVILIZATION has its handicaps as well as its advantages when it comes to food. Delectable viands from every corner of the globe may have improved the food supply, but at the same time subtle changes have been taking place to rob the diet of the inland dweller of some of its essential stuff.

Iodin is the illusive mineral that has escaped from the soil of the Great Lakes region and the far West until the supply is so depleted that simple goiter is the result. If people had stayed at home along the seashore, where they could replenish their supply of iodin from sea air and an abundance of fresh sea food, this disease of the thyroid gland would be comparatively rare.

Although goiter has existed for a long time and in almost every part of the world, in both man and beast, the investigations of science have not been sufficient until recently to point the way to relief. In the meantime, the iodin supply has grown less with each generation, every mother being obliged to divide her scanty store with each of her children. Where she has not been able to restore her supply between pregnancies, both she and the children have suffered, the last child being more likely to develop goiter than the first. In many localities this drainage of resources has resulted in goiter in twenty-five per cent. of the women, while in some areas goiter in fifty per cent. or more of the women is not unusual. As the situation grows more acute, men are also showing a high percentage of the same deficiency.

As long as the iodin contents of the thyroid gland is above a certain level, goiter does not develop. It is when demands for iodin are made upon the body in excess of the amount provided in the food and water that the storage is gradually reduced and enlargement takes place. The increase in the size of the gland is a means of compensating for its insufficiency.

The thyroid is most likely to become bankrupt when the demands of puberty, pregnancy, lactation or infection increase the need for iodin. It is also heavily drawn upon during great emotional strain. The mother who does not go into pregnancy with a surplus of all the building materials her child will need is bound to sacrifice some of her own supply unless her diet includes a sufficient amount. In infection and in other conditions where the body is called upon to combat toxic products, the thyroid may be overworked, as the handling of these poisons is one of its jobs. Any upset in the functions of the thyroid has a far-reaching effect on the body as a whole because the glands of internal secretion are a powerful trust in control of important bodily functions.

Although the need for iodin is very great in certain sections of the country, the amount required is very small. When the iodin in the thyroid is about one two-hundredths or five-tenths of one per cent. of its entire weight, the gland has all the iodin it can store. When only one-fifth of this maximum amount is present, the lower limit has been reached and enlargement takes place. The normal supply lies between these two amounts. In the goiter belt, it is reasonable to suppose that the majority of people tend to approach this lower limit, while it is known that a very large number are far below it. Where goiter has already developed, a physician should be consulted, but who besides the home-maker can adequately feed her family to prevent further occurrence of this unnecessary disease?

THE prevention of goiter is primarily a nutrition problem. In spite of the fact that inorganic compounds of iodin may be administered with apparent success, iodin as it occurs in food is much to be preferred. "Back to nature" is a safety slogan, especially in these days of refined foods and prodigal methods of food preparation. The food and water even in the goiter belt are not entirely lacking in iodin and it behooves the home-maker to conserve as much as possible of this natural supply. The habit of using many vegetables and fruits raw, and of eating the juices of those that are cooked will tend to enrich the diet to some extent.

The only foods that contain significant quantities of iodin are foods from the sea. The sea-moss, which may be used in desserts and other foods, has the highest content of iodin of all the ocean food products. Next come lobsters, clams and oysters. It is interesting to note that these contain from twenty to nearly three hundred times as much iodin as some of the most common

JETS OF CRYSTAL

Crystal jets of pure water are played from every angle on every glass jar and bottle in which a Heinz Variety is to be put up, and each piece of glassware emerges as clean and sparkling as the row of tumblers on your dresser.

This ingenious machine symbolizes in a very practical way the spirit of cleanliness that prevails everywhere in the Heinz Kitchens. There are no "neglected corners". Every process is characterized by a cleanliness that equals if not exceeds the care of the proudest housewife.

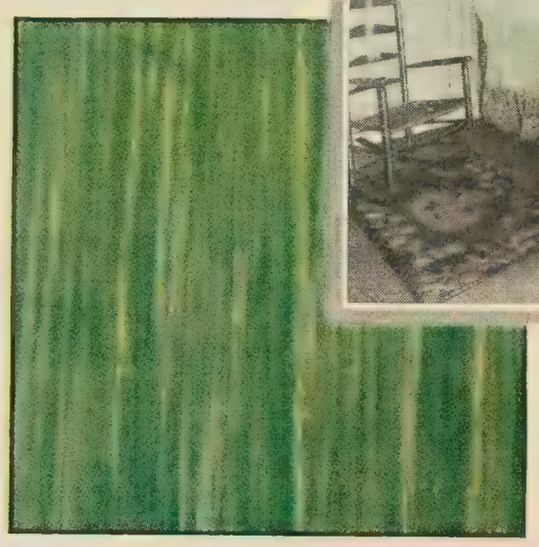
And cleanliness is but one of the many virtues for which the Heinz institution is continually striving. It is its aim to deserve the confidence of every woman by preparing good things to eat in a way that good housekeepers approve · · H. J. HEINZ COMPANY

When in Pittsburgh don't fail to visit the Heinz Kitchens.

Here's the sunlight and cheer of all outdoors

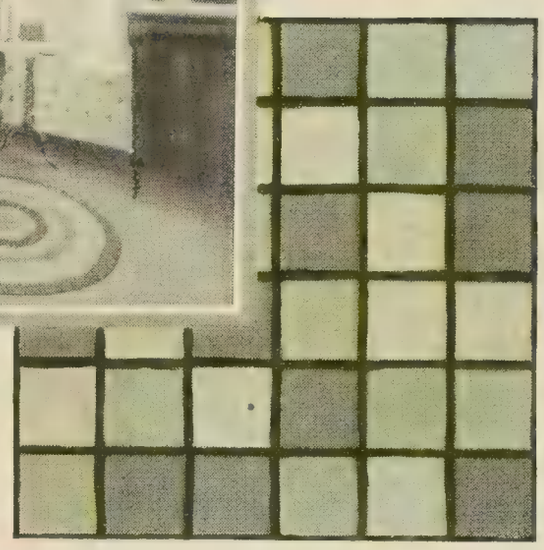
Now pretty, colorful interiors can have a floor of pattern and color, too

WHERE is the husband who wouldn't fairly beam under the "good-morning" smile of this breakfast room? Neat, simple furniture, quaintly colorful china, and a Handcraft red tile floor of Armstrong's Linoleum—there's a cheerful combination to start the early riser off happy! Imagine, for instance, the old worn floor of wood that originally bothered the owner of this room. Can't you just see the sunlight and cheer that entered when this pretty linoleum floor was cemented down?



It so happens that an interior decorator selected this particular floor. But choosing the design and color of linoleum for any room in the house is an easy, pleasant task for anyone, with the new Armstrong patterns now on display at good furniture or department stores.

To the right are three of the many new patterns that architects and decorators are using for residences. At the top is an Armstrong's Handcraft tile pattern, an inspiration of our designers that is patented and given the effect of a hand-laid floor.



The softly rippled green pattern is known as Armstrong's Jaspé—it comes in rich, two-toned blues, browns, greens, or grays. The New England bedroom photographed has a floor of the gray Jaspé. Notice how well the heavier pieces of furniture and colored rugs show up on it!

This New England bedroom has a pretty floor of Armstrong's Gray Jaspé Linoleum No. 12, as a background for small rugs.

At the left is Armstrong's Jaspé, also obtainable in rippled browns, blues, or grays.

These blended tiles are known as Armstrong's Handcraft (patented) tiles. This pattern, No. 3131, can also be had in either red or blue.

Look for the CIRCLE A trade-mark on the burlap back

Laid with cement—no tacks

Good stores will cement these beautiful floors of Armstrong's Linoleum over a cushioning layer of builders' deadening felt. This method of laying not only prevents the linoleum from cracking or buckling but eliminates all gaping, dust-collecting seams. What a comfort such a floor is! It is warmer than a wood floor; it is springy and comfortable to work over (linoleum, you know, is made of powdered cork and oxidized linseed oil). Wax your linoleum floor occasionally and it will need only a daily dust-mopping to keep it clean. And a waxed linoleum floor will never need refinishing.

Our Bureau of Interior Decoration under the direct supervision of Mrs. Hazel Dell Brown will be glad to send you color scheme suggestions for walls and draperies, as well as for floors. Address Armstrong Cork Company, Linoleum Division, 869 West Walnut Street, Lancaster, Pennsylvania.

For an idle attic—or a bright sun porch—this neat modeled inlaid pattern has sparkle and vivacious color. It is Armstrong's No. 5064.

Sea-moss, cod-liver oil, lobster, iodized salt and shrimp—these are some of the foods for you if you live in the "goiter belt" fresh-water fish. Shrimp has about twice as much iodin as most of the common sea fish, which contain considerable amounts. The best of these are bluefish, Spanish mackerel, tautog, spot, cod and haddock. White perch and rock rank well in their iodin content. The roe seems to have considerably more iodin than the flesh of the fish. It is a fairly safe guess that all fishery products contain iodin, but that those from the ocean have very much more than the fresh-water fish.

Where fresh sea foods are available, they may be preferred to any other form, but the canned and salted products are more convenient and less expensive to use. One of the most desirable ways of using salt fish is in chowder, because it can be added without previous cooking. Sea foods are no longer in the class of luxuries, but should be considered one of the most valuable parts of a well-rounded diet. If sea foods can be included in the menu one or more times a week, the iodin content of the family menu will be increased many fold and the prospect of goiter development under average conditions will be considerably reduced. Another excellent source of iodin which should also be considered a food is cod-liver oil. Its outstanding reputation for a high content of vitamin A and the vitamin which prevents rickets is increased by the fact that it ranks above the best of the sea fish in its iodin content. Although not so much cod-liver oil as fish is advised for a serving, still it may be used more regularly and conveniently than most sea products, even if its gustatory attractiveness may be considerably less. In no other way can a food high in iodin as well as other very necessary food materials be given in so small a space. There are many less natural ways of providing iodin. One of the most interesting and valuable of these is the organic iodin compound extracted from kelp, a seaweed very rich in iodin. The use of natural sea-salt, which contains not only iodin but several other minerals in abundance, is an effort to restore to the diet substances drained from the soil. Commercial preparations of salt to which potassium iodid has been added also help to increase the iodin in the diet, but it is difficult to calculate the amount of iodin actually received by each member of the family where salt is depended upon as the main source of supply. If it is added to the vegetables when they are cooking and the water thrown away, much of the iodin will go with the water.

The fact that the salt contains iodin should not encourage a greater use of salt than is ordinarily taken. However, it is very unlikely that too much iodin would be eaten in salt alone. It is not too much to use natural sea-salt or iodized salt in addition to a diet rich in the foods that contain considerable iodin, and is to be recommended, especially in the goiter belt.

The administration of small doses of potassium or sodium iodid has been effective in preventing and relieving goiter, particularly in schools where enlarged glands were common among the children. The addition of iodin to the public water supply at certain times of the year is of uncertain value, partly because the amounts taken by different persons vary widely.

As far as possible iodin, as other food necessities, should be supplied in its natural forms. When it is impossible to receive an adequate amount from food and water, other wholesome sources should be utilized. In most cases there exists the problem of filling the human reservoirs that have been drained. Thereafter the task of maintaining the supply is a comparatively simple one.

Maybe your teeth are gloriously clear, simply clouded with a film coat. Make this remarkable test and find out.

Dazzling White Teeth

Here is the quick, new way dentists are widely urging

Make this unique test. Give your teeth high polish, and fresh new color simply by removing the dingy film that coats them and invites decay and gum troubles.

THIS offers you a simple, scientific test—one judged the most remarkable of all dental tests.

It will bring out qualities in your teeth you do not realize they have. In a short time you can work a transformation in their color and their luster.

Modern science has evolved a new and radically different method which successfully removes the dingy film that imperils healthy teeth and gums.

Simply send the coupon. Don't think your teeth are naturally "off color" or dull. This will prove they are not.

Film—the enemy of beautiful teeth and healthy gums

Run your tongue across your teeth, and you will feel a film . . . a viscous coat that covers them.

That film is an enemy to your teeth—and your gums. You must remove it.

It clings to teeth, gets into crevices and stays. It absorbs discolorations and gives your teeth that cloudy, "off color" look. Germs by the millions breed in it, and they, with tartar, are a chief cause of pyorrhea.

Tooth troubles and gum troubles now are largely traced to that film. Old-time methods fail in successfully combating it. That's why, regardless of the care you take now, your teeth remain dull and unattractive.

New methods remove it. And Firm the Gums

Now, in a new-type dentifrice called Pepsodent, dental science has discovered effective combatants. Their action is to curdle the film and remove it, then to firm the gums.

Now what you see when that film is removed—the whiteness of your teeth—the firmness of your gums—will amaze you.

* * *

Ordinary methods fail in these results.

Harsh, gritty substances are judged dangerous to enamel.

Thus the world has turned, largely on dental advice, to this new method.

"It is wonderful not to find yourself growing old"

Little chapters from the story of how the Arch Preserver Shoe changed the ideas of a Nation. No. 12

ON the steamer from Europe they had become friends. One of the women was from Cincinnati; the other was from Seattle.

Quite naturally, they traveled across the country together, and the Seattle friend was invited to stop over for a visit of a few days in Cincinnati.

The guest expected to find an elaborate home, with the conventional atmosphere of servants and luxurious furnishings. Rumor had told her that her hostess was one of the wealthiest women in Ohio.

But imagine her surprise when they were driven up to a rather modest home in one of the pretty little suburbs out from the city.

There were no servants to meet them. In the kitchen was a cook who had prepared a fine dinner. They ate rather silently, the western woman trying to adjust her impressions. The hostess noted the "bewilderment."

"I suppose you're wondering what kind of a woman I can be, living as I do," she remarked cheerfully as they were about to leave the table. "Most people think I'm plain and old-fashioned."

"No," replied the guest. "I like your home very much, and it is splendid of you to have me here. But isn't it unusual for you to have no servants? I don't see how you manage, at your age."

The hostess laughed. "At my age! I wonder why it is that women think they must be old and helpless at sixty. Why, I've never been so happy in my life."

"Oh, I didn't mean that you were old. But women at our age ordinarily can't do as much as a younger woman. We don't usually have the energy."

"That's just it. Too many women think they can't do things—the very things they ought to be doing.

"Look at me," she continued. "I've never been so happy in my life. And I've never done so much. Every morning I'm out with my wire-haired fox terriers. I just love them. And I dust and sweep and make beds. Angelina cooks the meals—and together we keep things going along nicely.

"Five years ago my husband died. He left me with plenty of money, a big city home, servants—everything. I suppose most women would have envied me.

"But I simply couldn't be happy that way, nothing to do but sit and think. I was tired of travel, tired of everything. I was an old woman. I had never worked, because I had never had to. But I decided that I must do something—and here I am.

"Of course, it's wonderful," said the guest. "But yet I don't see how you do it. I hate so to walk and be on my feet. I have never known a woman of your age who could do so much."

For a moment the Cincinnati woman meditated, a smile playing over her face. Finally: "Do you remember what I told you about Switzerland? I did some mountain climbing over there. I can walk miles and miles. My secret is shoes."

"Tell me about them," said the guest.

Then, as enthusiastic as the first time she put on Arch Preserver Shoes, this young-old woman told in minute detail why she could do so many things because of the shoes she wore.

She explained the concealed, built-in, arch bridge that holds up the instep and prevents sagging. She made a comparison of how the foot is treated in ordinary sagging-arch shoes and when it is allowed to rest flat on the ground.

Then she told about the flat inner sole that allows the bones, nerves and blood-vessels of the forepart of the foot to function normally, without being pinched or cramped.

And, of course, she explained why these shoes can be in good style, and how they keep their shape until completely worn out, simply because they can't sag.

"I know you can't understand all this foolish talk about my shoes," she concluded, "but these Arch Preserver Shoes have kept me from getting old and useless. And it is so wonderful not to find yourself growing old."

And so, women all over America are learning today that to be young means to be active, to do things, to enjoy doing them—to feel young!

This explains why the Arch Preserver Shoe, by enabling women to retain foot youth and vigor, has become the outstanding success of the shoe industry. This explains why hundreds of thousands of women, many of them rich, who could afford to have all of their footwear made by hand, come to the stores of our dealers and insist upon getting this shoe and no other.

Most women need active feet. All women can enjoy them—by living a fuller, happier life and taking a more extensive part in things.

You will find it worth while to get acquainted with this shoe. The coupon below will bring your copy of our booklet, "Use Your Feet"—which will give you many more interesting facts.

"KEEPS THE FOOT WELL"

*"She * * * placed a little mirror inside her mouth, to look behind her teeth." Try it yourself! Look especially, behind your lower front teeth. You, too, may be surprised at what you see.*

She thought her teeth were clean

Her pride in their beauty was perfectly natural
Then an unpleasant discovery

SHE sat down before her looking glass and placed a little mirror inside her mouth, to look behind her teeth. Horror! At the gumline she saw a suspicious gray-white deposit. Tartar. Here and there were small dark stains; and the spaces between the teeth had a discolored look.

She must go to her dentist. A brief examination, then the announcement: "Four cavities. A considerable amount of tartar."

"Must be my own fault, I suppose," she asked.

"Why, no," was the answer. "You take better care of your teeth than most of my patients. The trouble is, people don't realize how far they are from really cleansing the parts far back and the space between the teeth. Then they are surprised when troubles develop!"

"But how can a person get at such places?" she insisted. "Goodness knows I try hard enough!"

"You'd find a liquid cleanser would be a great help," the dentist suggested, "for it will reach the inaccessible places as readily as the visible outer surfaces. Lately, I have been testing such a preparation—the first real dentifrice in liquid form that I ever heard of—not just an antiseptic wash but an efficient tooth cleanser. If you would use it regularly, you'd soon be aware of the benefit."

That is how she came to use Mu-Sol-Dent.

Discovered at Mellon Institute, University of Pittsburgh, after experts had tried for thirty years to find an "efficient solvent of mucin"—certified as such by this institution—Mu-Sol-Dent cleanses teeth in a new scientific way: It dissolves the sticky mucin film from the surfaces of the teeth.

Thus is removed the medium in which decay germs breed and in which are built up tartar crusts, to cause irritation and pyorrhea. Actual, practical experience, borne out by the willing testimonials of 4,000 dentists, shows that Mu-Sol-Dent does thus actually prevent both decay and tartar.

Mu-Sol-Dent is, moreover, a gargle and mouth wash of unequalled healing qualities. It does the work of tooth paste, gargle, and antiseptic wash combined, in a safe, easy and effective way.

THE TRUTH ABOUT WATER

By Flora Rose

Director, New York State College of Home Economics

WHAT tortures some of us suffered in the old days after the dictum went forth—"Water at meal times retards digestion."

Now we know that the contrary is actually the case. Water does dilute the digestive juices, but these fluids act more effectively diluted. In fact there are types of difficult digestion that are markedly improved by the simple addition of one or two extra glasses of water at each meal, and this is one of the best times to include a considerable part of the day's liquid. Water at mealtimes may perhaps be taboo for certain overfat types, who are trying to lose in weight, although the evidence to prove the real value of this omission of water has never been very convincing to me. For some disorders such as types of heart trouble and high blood-pressure, it is necessary to cut down water at all times. These are not normal cases, however, and belong under the doctor's jurisdiction.

There is one limitation that should be placed on water at meal-times. It should never be used as a stream to float food from the mouth to the stomach. Reasonable chewing of food before it is swallowed seems to be of decided advantage to the digestive apparatus of the human being. If short cuts, such as washed-down chunks, are resorted to, there is apt to be difficulty.

The value of drinking water is by no means limited to its beneficial effects in diluting the digestive juices. It is in the truest sense of the word a cleansing agent in that it helps to carry along the digestive tract fragments of food, and it stimulates the peristaltic action of the digestive tract. That is why, after the digestive tract has rested over night, one, two or more glasses of water before breakfast are so beneficial in helping to prevent constipation. A little salt or some lemon-juice added to the water retards its passage, seems to hold it in the stomach and intestine, rather than permit it to go so rapidly to the blood stream, increases its stimulus to peristalsis and thus increases its value in ridding the intestine of its waste. To drink water in normal abundance helps to keep food wastes from putrefying in the intestine.

Not only does an abundance of water aid in keeping a clean intestine, it also aids in diluting and carrying waste products from the tissues to the organs of elimination.

Lemon-juice in water before breakfast encourages good health

What constitutes an abundance of water in the daily diet? There is a considerable variation in the amount needed by each human being. It depends in part upon the amount of other liquids taken, on the amount of salt in the diet, on the amount of fruit and vegetables eaten, upon the relation between sugar, starch and fat in the diet, upon the season of the year and the amount of clothes worn and the temperature and humidity of the rooms in which one lives. All these factors, however, do not affect a certain fundamental need. In general it may be said that four to eight glasses of water a day is the right amount for older children and adults, if the children are drinking in addition a quart of milk a day and the adults are having its equivalent in milk, coffee and tea.

More water than this may be a distinct advantage to many. Less than this should be regarded with a critical eye. The best times to drink this water during the day are before breakfast, two glasses; two glasses at each of the three meals, and at such other times as thirst makes its claims.

Our leaflet OVERCOMING CONSTIPATION gives you diets and exercises which help to remedy faulty elimination. Just a two-cent stamp for postage will bring it to you if you send your letter to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

While Paris is preparing her Smartest Modes for St. Moritz—

Butterick has them already here . . every smallest detail made easy for you

Men's Knickers No. 5877 Coat No. 6370 Ladies' Knickers No. 3496

The warmest and wooliest of smart things—Winter in St. Moritz

SPARKLING snows and glistening peaks! Skiing in the morning—luncheon—more skiing—bridge—and tea—dinner—dancing—or bridge again!

Each year finds ever greater numbers of fashionables who dash for the bracing Winter sports of the Swiss mountains.

December finds the Paris houses inspired by the enchanting task of dressing these enthusiasts. Their wardrobes include everything from the warmest and wooliest, the most dashing and independent, to the filmiest and most feminine.

And the same inspiration carries over and glorifies every chic town frock of the Parisienne who stays at home, the soft warm coats of armies of Winter travelers, the brilliant dinner gowns and wraps that will grace the social season in New York.

How Butterick headquarters in Paris forward the news

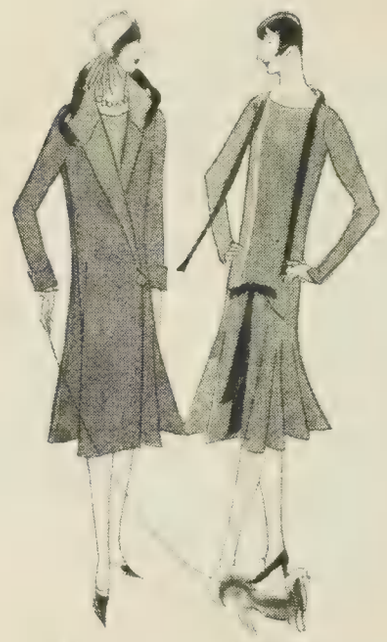
On the Rue de la Paix, and the Avenue de l'Opera, where Butterick has its Paris headquarters—all is likewise brilliantly busy. Fashion experts are issuing daily to observe, to note. Eager news is brought in. A new fabric. A new color. A new way with fastenings. A new décolletage.

Before the new things are well on their way to sparkling St. Moritz, or to bustling New York—despatches, sketches, cables, radios are carrying the minutest details of them to Butterick in New York.

By the first of the month they are ready—the crisp new paper patterns which will tell you more than any other pattern! The very fashions Paris is creating. The very fabrics and colors. Not only how to cut and fit them, but the very latest finishing touches as Paris is doing them.

FOR folded in with every Butterick Pattern is the Deltor, which shows you, step by step, in illustrations and the printed word, every detail of the making.

The new princess frock. The latest flare at back, or side, or front. That little upstanding collar that you thought was beyond you. Those long streaming tie-ends. The swirling skirt. The touch of metallic trimming that sets the seal of modishness on your very own frock. Not one detail is unexplained.



As you pat the last fold in place, and take the last stitch, you can hardly believe you did it all yourself.

Every Butterick Pattern gives you just this help. Make your very next dress or coat by it. See how easy it is—and how proud you will be to wear it! Butterick of New York, Paris and London.

BUTTERICK PATTERNS WITH THE DELTOR

Jellied cranberries make timely and inexpensive Christmas gifts

SAVE DOLLARS AND HOURS

Hints from successful housewives

If you have discovered some clever little way to save time or labor or fuel or food or anything else connected with housekeeping, tell us about it—and if we can use it in these columns we will pay you five dollars for it. Write on only one side of the paper, and address your letters to the "Savers" Editor, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y. (If you wish to have your suggestion returned in case we can not use it, please enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope.)

SAVE ON CHRISTMAS GIFTS

When I make jellied cranberry for my own Christmas dinner, I always put up a few extra jars, using the following recipe:

Make a sirup of two cups of sugar to one cup of water. Heat this until it boils slowly. Then pick over and wash one quart of cranberries. Drop these into the boiling sirup and cook until tender. When finished, the cranberries will have a transparent look. Pour into jelly-glasses or mayonnaise jars. When cool, cover with paraffin and wrap the top in white or fancy paper. Tied with ribbon and decorated with pine or holly, this makes an attractive and timely gift.—MRS. C. B. S., New York, N. Y.

SAVE OLD FELT HATS

Rip the binding and bands from discarded felt hats and cut the brim from the crown. Next cut a circular piece from the top and cut the side crown so it can be flattened. Cover these pieces with a damp cloth and press them flat. Felt from even cheap hats has a great variety of uses, some of which are for insoles in felt slippers and rubber boots, to glue on the base of lamps and vases and on the feet of chairs to protect floors. The circular top is just right, when covered, to use for a holder.—MISS O. S., New York, N. Y.

SAVE LOSING JEWELRY

When traveling, invariably follow one plan in caring for jewelry when it is removed from the hands or dress. The best method I have found is to fasten it on a strong safety-pin and fasten the safety-pin to one's clothing.—MRS. E. A. E., Newton Center, Mass.

SAVE WITH HOLIDAY PLANTS

A friend who had a new home where the grounds were still undeveloped was delighted with a Christmas gift of perennial plants. The gift was started in the Spring before Christmas. They included hollyhock, larkspur, foxglove, phlox, pinks and sweet-williams. All of these with the exception of phlox were raised from seed. As the plants could not be presented at Christmas time, I wrote the names of them on a card tied, to it a small garden hoe, and sent it on Christmas Day.—J. B., Appleton City, Mo.

SAVE WITH OLD MAGAZINES

When I was a little girl my sisters and I spent many happy Winter evenings coloring with our crayons the fashionable ladies in the stacks of old DELINEATORS that our mother had saved from the time when it had first become her household guide in her early married days. A few years ago it became necessary to reduce our Christmas expenditures to a minimum, and remembering the joy in mother's old DELINEATORS, I rolled up my previous year's copies and sent them, together with colored crayons, blunt scissors and a tube of paste to a family of small nieces in the country, where I knew the few magazines that found their way into the home were far too precious to be mutilated by the childish hands. The gift afforded such pleasure that I have chosen to repeat it each year since in preference to something more expensive.—MRS. F. R. W., Hempstead, N. Y.

SAVE SPACE AND HAVE A SEWING TABLE

What home-maker who must combine bedroom and sewing-room would not find this table very useful? It is made of light-weight boards fitted together, preferably twelve-inch cypress or white pine. The table is to be made thirty-six inches wide, the usual width of dress goods, and sixty inches long. It is not difficult to get the boards at a sawmill, having them cut sixty inches long and with grooved edges. The top is covered with beaverboard, which is cemented on. Pins used to hold patterns in place are easily pressed into the beaverboard. This sewing-table is hinged to the wall and has one leg to support the table when in use.—MRS. M. A. M., Pablo Beach, Fla.

SAVE POLISH AND UNSIGHTLY CLEANING-CLOTHS

After using polishing-cloths, I store them away in an empty coffee-can which has a tight lid. This prevents the polish from evaporating, and also provides a place where the cloths may be kept out of sight.—MRS. W. A. A., Sioux City, Iowa.

SAVE CROOKED CURTAINS

When curtains are ready to launder, measure them carefully, then after they are washed stretch them on the floor on a sheet and pin them to the sheet, using the measurements of the curtains before they are laundered. The second curtain can easily be pinned over the first one and they will dry very quickly. If this method is used, one is sure of having straight curtains.—MRS. T. G. C., Fort Worth, Tex.

SAVE ON DOLLAR-SAVERS

When you send us a dollar-saver it will save your time and ours if you make sure first that it does not cover any of the following subjects: Removing water spots, iodin stains, or blood stains; cleaning silver and scorched pans; using inflammables; saving flowers; removing tomato and fruit skins; using men's old shirts; increasing wear of silk stockings, or using THE DELINEATOR. Suggestions on these topics have already appeared in this column, and our space is too limited to repeat. We are also unable to use recipes and kitchen records, or items on remedies or cure-alls.

326 MEMBERS of New York's exclusive JUNIOR LEAGUE and Boston's VINCENT CLUB tell why they are using this soap for their skin

THE ANNUAL CHARITY BALL of the New York Junior League. Among 600 members of the New York Junior League and the Vincent Club of Boston, Woodbury's was seven times as popular as any other soap

TWENTY-FIVE years ago a little group of New York's loveliest debutantes organized a flower committee to distribute the gorgeous bouquets from their coming-out teas among the hospitals of the city.

Out of this graceful gesture grew the Junior League—today one of the most socially important groups in the country.

No one ever becomes a member of the Junior League who is not backed by flawless social credentials. It represents New York's aristocracy of youth; young girls and young married women whose names have a dazzling association of beauty, wealth, and distinguished ancestry.

We personally interviewed six hundred leading members of New York's Junior League and Boston's brilliant and exclusive Vincent Club.

How, we asked, do these young girls take care of their skin? What soap do they select as the best for keeping their skin soft, smooth, radiantly fresh and fair?

Seven times as popular

Three hundred and twenty-six members, or more than half the entire number interviewed, said they used Woodbury's Facial Soap regularly for their skin.

To Free Your Skin From Blackheads—use the famous Woodbury treatment on Page 4 of the booklet, "A Skin You Love to Touch"

The largest number using any other one soap was forty-two.

Some of the comments

"It keeps my skin smooth and free from oil." "It helps to keep my skin free from blackheads." "It is the best, purest soap I know—I use it here and abroad, winter and summer." "It does not irritate a sensitive skin."

A skin specialist worked out the formula by which Woodbury's is made. This formula not only calls for absolutely pure ingredients. It also demands greater refinement in the manufacturing process than is commercially possible with ordinary toilet soap.

A 25c cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap lasts a month or six weeks. Around each cake is wrapped a booklet containing special cleansing treatments for overcoming common skin defects.

Get a cake of Woodbury's today and begin tonight the treatment your skin needs!

ASK US

Ask us anything you want to know about housekeeping and we will answer it personally. From our recent correspondence we publish the following questions and answers as being of general interest to all home-makers

QUESTION—Will you give me a very good recipe for angel-food cake?

Answer—

9 egg-whites
1 teaspoon cream of tartar
1 cup sugar
⅞ cup flour
⅛ teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon vanilla

Beat the whites of the eggs to a froth, add the cream of tartar, beat till the eggs are stiff but not dry; then gradually add the sugar (which has been sifted twice), beating after additions. Sift the flour with the salt five times and fold it into the mixture. Add the vanilla. Bake in an ungreased angel-cake tin in a very moderate oven, not more than 330 to 360 degrees Fahrenheit. Be careful not to jar or disturb while baking. Remove from the oven, turn the pan upside down on a wire netting, or with a knife-handle or some other small article inserted under the edge of the pan to permit steam to escape, and let it stand until the cake falls out. Ice placed on the bottom of the tin will hasten the release of the cake. In making this cake, the eggs should be three or four days old and very cool. The sugar used in making it should be finely granulated. If it is not finely granulated, then the wisest thing to do is to add half a cup of water to the sugar and cook it to a temperature of 250 degrees Fahrenheit. Pour this sirup over the stiffly beaten egg-whites. Beat the two together until the mixture is cool, then proceed with the flour.

The temperature of the oven should be 320 degrees Fahrenheit or less. Many persons begin an angel-cake in a cool oven. Angel-cake should be baked in an ungreased pan, lest it shrink and fall a little.

Question—What causes the circles which come around spots I have tried to remove from a new messaline silk dress?

Answer—When cloth contains a considerable amount of finishing substance, as is the case with messaline, it is almost impossible to remove spots without leaving circles. In moistening the spot with the cleanser it floats the finishing substance to the edge of the spot treated. The only way to help this is to work very rapidly from the outside of the spot toward the center, thus redistributing the finishing substance or evaporating the cleanser before this substance floats. If circles have already been formed, the whole garment may need to be dipped in cleanser in order to eliminate the circles. Dirt on clothing will act similarly in causing spots.

Question—What can I do to keep my plum and suet puddings from becoming soggy.

Answer—A soggy pudding is probably due to insufficient cooking, though it may be the fault of the recipe. Try increasing the time you cook your puddings before changing the recipe. A pudding in which three cups of flour and two cups of liquid are used should steam at least three hours. The can containing the pudding should be closely covered with a tin cover or by tying greased paper over the top. Put the can on a trivet in a kettle that can be covered closely and have the water come only part way up on the can, or else steam the pudding in a steamer.

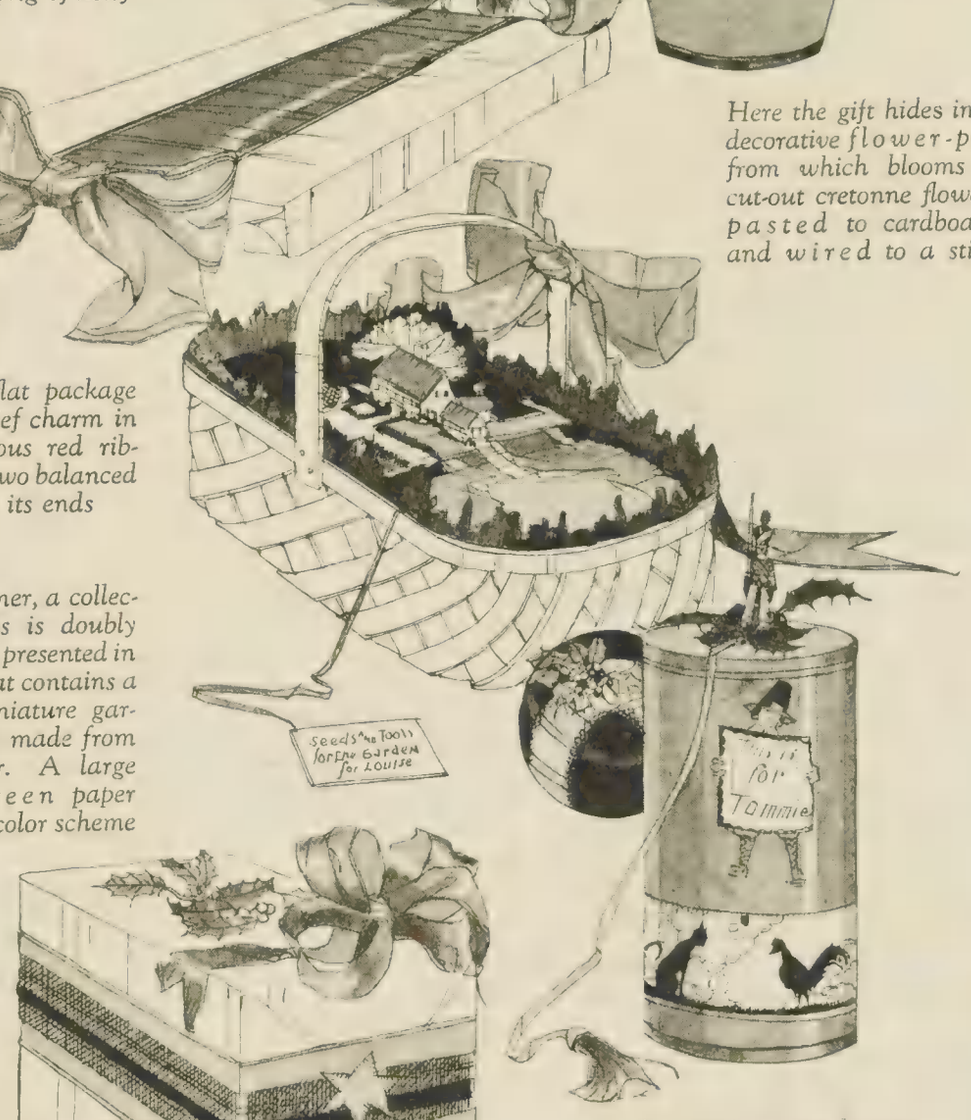
PRETTY CHRISTMAS WRAPPINGS—

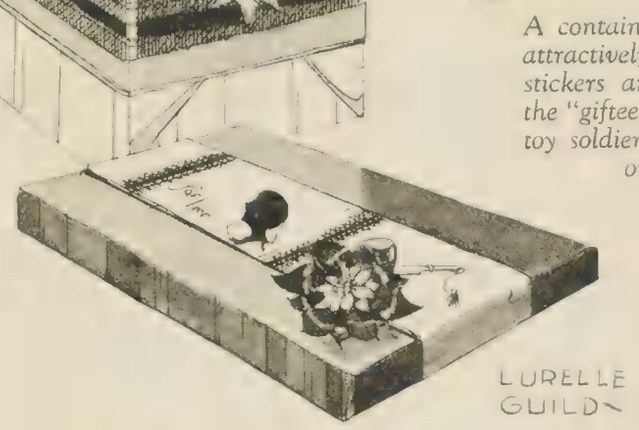
Are as important as the gifts themselves

Be it quaint, bizarre, dainty or practical, the covering should express the personality of the gift. These unique packages show a few ways that it may be done. If you wish directions for other distinctive Christmas wrappings, write to the Department of House Decoration, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y. Please enclose a stamped return envelope



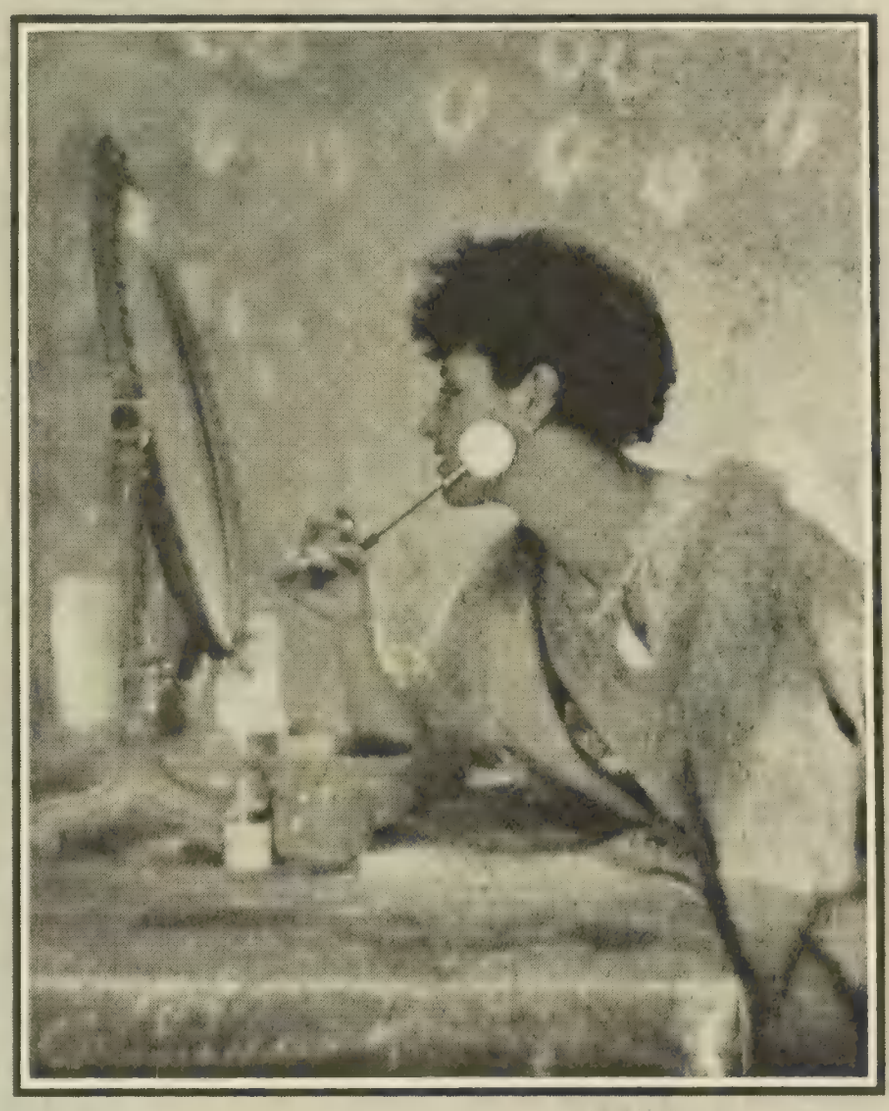
Red ribbon contrasts gaily with this gift-box wrapped in white tissue-paper, and a pleated strip of flowered wall-paper is held jauntily in place by a sprig of holly

Here the gift hides in a decorative flower-pot from which blooms a cut-out cretonne flower, pasted to cardboard and wired to a stick



This long flat package finds its chief charm in broad lustrous red ribbon tied in two balanced bows at its ends

For a gardener, a collection of tools is doubly delightful if presented in a basket that contains a realistic miniature garden cleverly made from crape paper. A large bow of green paper adds to the color scheme



A container can be gay attractively trimmed with stickers and a label for the "giftee." Here a little toy soldier stands guard on top

Paper ribbon is often substituted for woven silk ribbon. It comes in gay colors and may be combined, as here, with real ribbon and holly

The usual color scheme is here reversed, the paper being red and the ribbon white. A clever touch is a silhouette of the person for whom the gift is intended pasted on the ribbon

Prevent this

Worried about the appearance of her teeth

Tooth decay truly is a menace to the nation's health.

If this sounds exaggerated to you, just ask your dentist. Let him tell you how prevalent it is and how serious are the consequences when tooth decay is allowed to undermine your health.

Good Looks Depart When Teeth Decay

Authorities Declare Preventive Dentistry Protects Beauty as Well as Good Health

Use Colgate's—

It removes causes of tooth decay

PRESERVE the youthful charm of your smile by sensible care of your teeth.

Preventive dentistry—the combating of disease by the prevention of tooth troubles—is the new note in advanced dental practice. Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream has always been in the forefront of this scientific move for better teeth and health. Colgate's is a preventive dental cream. Its taste is delicious. It removes causes of tooth decay.

"Washes", Polishes, Protects

Colgate's contains no harsh grit—no dangerous ingredients. It "washes" your teeth gently and safely. Its principal ingredients are fine chalk and mild soap, the two substances recommended by eminent dental authorities. The fine chalk is the polishing agent. The soap supplies the needed washing action. The combined action protects by removing clinging particles of food from the teeth and edges of the gums.

You can't be too careful of your teeth. "Wash" them after every meal with Colgate's. It is made right and priced right—25c for the large tube at your favorite store.

ASK THE DELINEATOR

If you have any questions to ask about your cooking or housekeeping problems about building or furnishing your home, about your child's care and training, about beauty, or any other household or personal question, consult our experts

Be sure (1) to address your inquiry to THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.; (2) to give us your return address; (3) to enclose a two-cent stamp for postage on a free leaflet, and sufficient stamps or checks whenever an additional amount is fixed to cover the cost of printing and postage

Is Yours a "Happy Child"?—Your child will be happy if it is mentally and physically healthy. Doctor Shaw will help you keep it so. Every month, in a letter to you, he will give you timely advice on feeding, clothing and training your youngster. He will warn you against seasonal epidemics.

To get this monthly letter all you have to do is become a member of one of The Happy Child Clubs for DELINEATOR Mothers. Simply send twenty-five cents with your name and address and tell us which club you wish to join.

There are four clubs—for:

1. Expectant Mothers
2. Mothers of the New Baby
3. Mothers of the Runabout
4. Mothers of the School Child

Join now, and Doctor Shaw's interesting and helpful letter will come to you immediately.

Feed Them Well and Keep House Efficiently—Bring your housekeeping and cooking problems to Martha Van Rensselaer for solution. With her staff at Cornell University Miss Van Rensselaer takes up the questions that confront you and gladly sends you personal advice.

She has also a large group of interesting leaflets on nutrition, diets for overweight, underweight and constipation, budgeting, housecleaning and all sorts of recipes. A complete list of these leaflets will be mailed you for just a two-cent stamp to cover postage.

An Artistic Livable Home—The best way to get one is to let Mrs. Charles Bradley Sanders, Director of the Department of House Decoration and Home Building help you with your furnishing problems. Send her a description of your rooms and she will suggest color schemes, furniture and decorations.

Mrs. Sanders's special bulletins will help you furnish your home tastefully. They cost only twenty-five cents each and are attractively written and illustrated—GOOD FLOORS; CURTAINS AND DRAPERIES; WALLS, WOODWORK AND CEILINGS; FURNISHING THE HOME; HOW TO CHOOSE, FRAME AND HANG YOUR PICTURES; HOW TO KNOW GOOD FURNITURE; METHODS OF PAINTING FURNITURE; SLIP-COVERS AND HOW TO MAKE THEM.

Lady or Gentleman?—Whose name is given first in an introduction? When do you "present" a person to another? All the finer points of correct introductions are discussed in our leaflet, INTRODUCTIONS, INVITATIONS AND REPLIES.

THE NURSERY SCHOOL

physical care and mental care. It has learned that there is a mental hygiene as well as a physical hygiene of the young child. It recognizes the fundamental importance of nutrition, of fresh air, sunlight and sleep. It keeps a systematic watch for all signs of illness and contagion. But in addition it safeguards mental health.

Mental health is the synthetic product of right living. Day by day these preschool children are being educated into mental health, through sheer force of habit. It is not so much a matter of absorption as of training. Even a young child is favorably conditioned by pleasant surroundings and by an atmosphere of calm and order. Some of the calm and order becomes part of his own "habit," his nature. If he gets a constant chance to do the right thing, he becomes wholesomely organized through his own reactions. He must learn nearly everything in life through his own behavior. Very little takes care of itself.

In a good nursery school—and also fortunately in a good home—the young child steadily acquires right habits of eating, of sleeping, of dressing, of playing, of obedience, of self-control and independence, of play and of work. His feelings also are organized through habit. His emotions become educated through his social environment. In all sorts of ways he comes to have rather stable attitudes, preferences, predispositions, prejudices. These feeling-habits are the results of experience. In a favorable environment he gets a rich stream of experience in regard to cleanliness, regularity, orderliness, respect for property and adjustment to other children. Not through any mysterious magic, but through the old-fashioned method of learning by doing, he acquires certain emotional trends (or habits) which give him more poise, more initiative, more sociability and adaptability in the difficult art of living with other people. In this sense he receives a fundamental kind of social education.

It is a great mistake to think that the mind will grow in its own predestined way, and that the child's systematic education may be safely postponed until he reaches school age. His reading and writing may be delayed that long with safety, but his life education begins in infancy. This is the philosophy of the nursery school and kindergarten. It holds that as early as the age of two years the child should learn certain fundamental living habits which will give his personality the right start and lay secure foundations for his later development. It is a process of nurture; it is also a process of prevention, because the child who is spoiled in his preschool years is precisely the child who turns up later at school or clinic as a problem case.

THE nursery school has already become a very valuable device for reeducating the problem child. We mean the behavior problem child, who is perhaps referred to a clinic because he won't eat, because he is excessively timid or because he has inordinate temper tantrums. The final burden and responsibility of properly managing such a child lie upon his parents, but the nursery school may be of very timely, concrete service in working out a solution.

For example, we recently made the acquaintance of an attractive child, four years of age, with entirely normal intelligence. The mother, however, reported that the child was "impossible," that he would not eat even though she punished him nearly so say over 1,700,000 Hoover owners

AS Christmas time draws near, how will you answer the question: "What shall I give her?" Naturally, you will consider, first, her need for those things that will make her life pleasurable.

You will want your gift to ease her tasks and speed them; to give her happy, care-free hours.

You will want it to be a thing substantial, whose span of life will be not months, but years.

"What is this gift?" you ask. It is a Hoover—the complete home-cleaning servant.

Will Christmas morning find it by her favorite chair—the token of your thoughtfulness?

There is only one who can answer that question. And you know him best!

Exquisitely groomed women use this method

SMOOTH RIMS

must frame the rosy gleaming nails of today

THE pink and gleaming nails of today are enchanting accents to slender fingers. Paris sponsored them. And yet bright and gleaming nails really cannot conceal ugly and neglected cuticle!

Perhaps you have been cutting yours and wondering why it only gets thicker and more ragged. Or you have let it grow tight to the nail—and then been troubled with hangnails and split edges!

With Cutex, the correct care of the cuticle is so simple! The dead dry skin that makes your nail rims look so untidy, is quickly loosened and removed.

Today this antiseptic method is followed by exquisite women all over the world. And in Paris, itself, and at the smart French resorts, the famous Cutex manicure preparations are used more than any other kind!

TRY THIS FAMOUS METHOD: First wash the hands in warm, soapy water. File the nails. Twist a bit of cotton around an orange stick and dip it in Cutex Cuticle Remover. Gently loosen and remove the shreds of dry skin. Pass the wet stick under the nail tips and smooth the least bit of Nail White under the tips.

Now wash your hands again. The cuticle is smooth and shapely—the tips white and flawless. Then, for a rosy brilliance, spread Cutex Liquid Polish smoothly over each nail.

How beautifully groomed your hands now are. You will never again allow unsightly cuticle to mar them.

Cutex sets are from 35c to $5.00—wherever toilet goods are sold. Single items are 35c, or see special offer.

THE NURSERY SCHOOL

every meal; that she usually ended by feeding him with a spoon, and even then he wouldn't always swallow! And the father could not change the situation by bribes or threats!

Was the child perverse? Or had the parents drifted into a wofully injudicious management of this behavior problem?

The parents were persuaded to send the child to a local nursery school. He at once fell under the spell of the group suggestion, or public opinion, of the nursery-school "pupils"; he very soon drank milk and ate spinach without protest; in a few days he even began to nap after the midday meal. In a word he promptly responded to a wholesome educational influence which included neither forcing nor fuss. The revolutionary improvement in his behavior was all accomplished in such a simple way that it might almost seem miraculous.

NOW it is evident that in this case the nursery school had something to teach to the mother as well as the child. The nursery school does not intend to become a permanent relief station, but desires to be an educational aid to parents. Perhaps its most valuable service lies right here. Child-training is a most difficult art, which every generation of parents has to learn over again. Nature furnishes inborn parental affection, but every practical detail of actual child-care needs to be acquired anew. How to hold a baby, when to pick him up, when not to pick him up, how to bathe him, how to give him cod-liver oil, how to impart self-help and self-control are simply a few of literally hundreds of problems of management which arise in infancy and early childhood. Often the perplexed parents must wish that nature had supplied not only the desire to do the right thing, but a prescription telling how to do it. There is a growing demand for more specific and constructive training of parents.

The nursery-school movement in America expresses this new concern for a better education for parenthood. The nursery school itself is in a formative stage and is by no means ready for universal adoption. It is, however, a method of approach to both parent and child, which must in some form become part of our educational system of the future.

A good beginning in this direction was made fifty years ago, when the first public-school kindergarten was established. The kindergarten has developed in this country as in no other land in the world. Its work has proved a blessing to countless young children, to well-circumstanced as well as to underprivileged children. The kindergarten is in harmony with the spirit of our institutions, and has had a profoundly liberalizing effect upon elementary education. It has also prepared the way for the nursery-school movement.

We must not forget that the kindergarten is now a cherished and official part of our public-school system. It has great possibilities of further growth and may gradually take on much of the work of the so-called nursery school. Already there are many public and private kindergartens which are taking in children from three to five years of age. In time some contact may be made with children as young as two years. Indeed, in Los Angeles the city board of education has taken over the entire responsibility for sixteen day nurseries which had at first been maintained by the parent-teachers associations. These are nurseries for children of "working mothers"; and the nurseries keep open eight hours a day.

The day nursery as a place simply for minding children, however, is something quite different from a nursery school or a nursery kindergarten, which is primarily interested in the education of the children and of their parents. The day nursery, as such, does not lie in the province of the public-school. The most natural way for the development of preschool education in this country is through the downward extension of the kindergarten. The public nursery school recently established in Michigan, as part of the public-school system, is particularly interesting, because it will be used as a demonstration and training center for girls who will study child-care in connection with their home economics courses.

Within the past year a hundred study groups on preschool education were organized by the American Association of University Women. These groups are composed mainly of mothers, but include teachers and social workers. In a dozen cities these mothers have organized nursery schools as a cooperative and exploratory venture.

This is a hopeful method of procedure. So far as possible the help of the public kindergarten should be enlisted in all these community efforts. Through the kindergarten, parental guidance conferences for mothers of young children can be instituted even without the establishment of all-day nursery schools. There are many ways in which some kind of nursery-school service may be rendered by the American kindergarten, both in the city and in the consolidated rural school. Four-year-old children may be allowed to attend on some kind of part-time basis. Occasional meetings with two- and three-year-old children and their mothers may be arranged. Thus school entrance will be made less abrupt and more constructive. Such a reconstructed kindergarten, reaching a guiding hand into the homes of the nation, may become a chief cornerstone of the public-school system.

A Recipe for Eternally Applied Beauty—and by that I mean "make-up."—From the maker of my cream comes this transforming recipe. Powder and rouge and lip-stick have been—well, not at all "nice" to many women. But living and loving aren't nice either unless they're done well. Making up to look more vivid is doing it not well; most women look not only not younger when they make up, but harder. It is because they have vividness in mind instead of softness. In the salon where I learned this valuable thing every attendant is taught that when a woman past twenty-five comes in she is to be made with the entire aim of softening. Youth can stand scenic painting, splashes of color, naked lines; their nice young bones and muscles react to strong contrasts, white skin, vermilion lips, plastered hair; but here in America, where one lives at concert pitch, the woman past thirty should be like a pastel, no strong contrasts, the color washed softly in, all in the tones of her own skin and hair and eyes. For instance, a woman with lips of soft raspberry color should not use bright rouge and vermilion lip-stick no matter how vivid it seems to make her; she should use the raspberry tones, intensifying, not changing, her own coloring—unless she wants to look hard and not "quite"—you know. And when she puts her powder on, it should not be strikingly different from her own skin. Powder is not to change your color so much as to give you softness, finish—the velvety look. If your skin is creamy or golden, then creamy or écru powder; pink, then flesh; white, then white with a lavender or flesh note in it. Nature has pitched the whole of you in one key, and that's the key you should be played in to the end of your days if you want to give out harmony. She fades you harmoniously as the years go by, slips you rhythmically from the major into the minor key. Follow her with your rouges and the toning of your hair. And when you sit down before your mirror to change your befriended face into a star, softly glowing, unknowable

Phenomenal Success of the New HARPERS Magazine

The new Harpers Magazine has achieved an unqualified success. The September issue—its first appearance—was completely sold out in ten days. And from all over the country enthusiastic and wholly spontaneous letters continue to pour in, in gratifying appreciation of the vigorous, youthful, provocative personality of the new magazine.

Moreover, the editorial forecast promises for the coming months even richer material. The best in fiction from America and England; fearless and vivid discussions of significant phases of American life; important points of view from and about Europe; brilliant criticism and absorbing problems involving the human equation.

A Few Comments

"The new Harpers has just come in. My sincere congratulations. The format is superb, and I like the new cover immensely." H. L. MENCKEN.

"I am delighted with your new magazine in every way." T. W. LAMONT.

"You are off to a fine start with the new Harpers. The September issue is about as good a magazine number as I ever saw. Congratulations!" VILHJALMUR STEFANSSON.

"Altogether a remarkable issue: perhaps one of the finest numbers, not merely of Harpers, but of any magazine that has ever been published in the United States." TIME.

"Thousands of people who have little contact with modern theological thought will find stimulating revelations in the messages issuing monthly from Dr. Fosdick's new supplementary pulpit of the printed word." THE CHURCHMAN.

¾ of Your Christmas Shopping Done in 5 Minutes Today

Why not, this year, dispense with all last minute shopping, and give yourself the luxury of a leisurely, unharassed, Merry Christmas, and incidentally give your friends what they will like above all things?

For the new Harpers with its brilliant variety appeals to so many different kinds of people—the older man (and isn't it difficult to find gifts for uncles and fathers!) is sure to be stimulated and interested in the clear sighted discussions of phases of present day civilization by such authoritative writers as Duncan Aikman, Ex-President Hadley, Charles Merz and Frank R. Kent. The witty and charming woman of the world confesses that she has found Harpers the most sympathetic periodical for educated, alert minds—and besides, a copy of Harpers on the living room table is a sure sign that people you'd like to know live in that house.

Harpers is a particularly happy choice for younger people, who follow with lively comment the spirited criticism of Bertrand Russell, Ludwig Lewisohn, Hendrik Van Loon, Rebecca West—and argue strenuously over Aldous Huxley, Sherwood Anderson and Edna St. Vincent Millay.

Besides, there are countless features which are absorbing to all—Dr. Fosdick's monthly department, "Religion and Life," the finest in fiction from both America and England, brilliant biography and history, romantic treatments of scientific subjects.

Five minutes spent right now at your desk, and the major part of your Christmas shopping is done, and the gifts are all wrapped up and mailed—a not inconsiderable item! And to make it even easier, we are giving you a special holiday offer—$3.00 for each gift subscription of one year instead of the regular price of $4.00. Fill in the coupon below and return it to us with a list of the friends to whom you want the magazine to go. We will send the subscriptions with Christmas cards in your name, at the proper time.

as Spring, think of it as a star. If you will, it will never emerge hard and glittering like a diamond.

A patter. Patters are like love—you must have a little control about them. The danger of a patter which one uses to bring up the circulation for the impoverished tissues and to exercise the flabby muscles is that one pats not wisely but too hard. A new spoon patter has been born. Lazy people like me, who won't pat faithfully, pat faithfully with this. It is of rubber and shaped exactly like a dessert spoon, and seems miraculously to fit all the curves of the face. You pat faithfully because it's such fun to see the spoon cuddle around the curves. It firms up the cheeks, smashes the double chin into line, brings up the blood gently, and somehow you never pat too hard with it. All the up-around-forties should have a spoon patter in the toe of their stockings.

Luster. The cream that won't come off with water and that makes your throat like a mother-of-pearl stem for your lovely nodding flower of a face! And your arms at the party gleam as no arms gleam outside of poetry and song.

A chin-strap and two liquid powders that will not dry the skin. The chin-strap for all those drooping heads that sit reading hours a day or are locked in writing immortal works; if this soft, comfy, pink satin strap were bound about those chins, so that they were held firm because the head just naturally didn't droop with the chin-strap on, then, oh then, you wouldn't hear people say, "Oh well, you can't expect her to be lovely—she's literary." And the rather yellow tone of her skin would vanish when she went out to view the world, if she had one of those two beautiful liquid powders that make the skin glow and be silken and glad and yet never dry.

Circulation ointment. Once or twice a week all the busy, hurrying season, spread on this dark and potent ointment and bring up the blood until you are purple; then the soothing cream afterwards, and all brown shadows and yellow tints and dead particles of skin will disappear. And from this same shop you can buy a beguiling, beautiful perfume that will rival any from alien shores, evolved by a woman for women—provocative, enchanting.

And always and forever befriend your eyes. They are your look of youth, luminous, depth on depth of shining beauty and strength. Faithfully take the simple exercises which keep their vitality; cleanse them with mild salt water or boric-acid water, night and morning; soften and feed the delicate skin around them with a special skin-food, brushing, always brushing up so that the ends will be uptilted, and feed the roots now and then with petroleum jelly. There is a little book to be had for the asking that will tell you all about it.

Then, last and best of all, the face that is following a star—lighted and clear and believing. I wish you that as my parting gift to you.

THE IRRESISTIBLE THREE

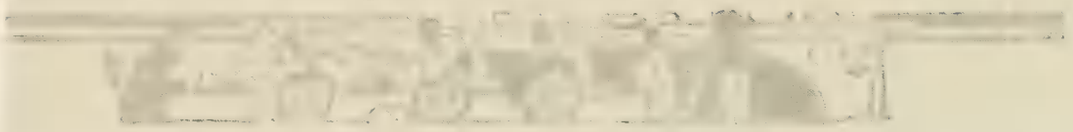
wonderful culinary lore of the great fictionist is obscured by the literary way in which it is presented, but I venture to say that the menus which can be extracted from the collected works of Dickens would be a valuable adjunct to any chef.

MANY of the Christmas dinners of which Dickens wrote with such gusto and detail begin with "a rich, clear broth in which there are gleaming grains of barley and thin rings of onion and a hint of spice"; there are "creamy, light fairylike mounds of mashed potato." These are Dickens potatoes, very, very different, alas, from many with which we are acquainted. To get the recipe, turn and see how Cap'n Cuttle made 'em. He "pared them with due regard to extracting all of their eyes"; he boiled them "tenderly"; he heated a little saucepan of milk; he dropped a large lump of butter into it "and stirred it with the most useful of spoons"; he drained the potatoes of moisture "until they fell apart in protest"; he mashed them with "a wooden implement"; he whipped them with the aforesaid spoon, and added the hot milk; he put them into the oven "for a wink" and served them "on plates so hot you could warm your hands at them."

And who but a practical cook such as Dickens could have added that touch of the gravy to the remarks of the old boarding-house keeper?

"The gravy alone, my dears," that worthy woman said to the two Misses Pecksniff, "is enough to add ten years to one's age. There is no such passion in human nature as the passion for gravy. A whole animal could not yield the amount of gravy that is expected each day at dinner."

This gravy has a recipe, too, which we find in one of the small "reprinted pieces." It was "based on the rich juices of the joint alone, for she had not the abominable French habit of adding water to the pan during the sacred process of roasting." The pan, after the roast was taken from it, was put on the fire and "carefully and deliberately, as befitted the importance of the moment," the cook stirred "a handful of fine flour" into it, and then after it was "a golden brown and as smooth as butter, she poured in a large cup of very thin broth, at the same time reaching for the box of fine, pulverized herbs, with the fragrance of which she sprinkled the bubbling mass."



The mince pies, "stick a bit o' Christmas in 'em," as Sam Weller admonished the fat boy, contained "two pounds of clear white suet, the same of raisins and currants, a pound of the leanest of beef, shredded, twenty rosy, juicy Winter apples, handsful of citron, cinnamon breathing odors of Araby, peel from oranges and lemons and little spoonsful of mace and spices."

The recipe for the Christmas pudding, which Dickens says must be "boiled a week," is given in one of the Christmas stories and calls for raisins, currants, suet, almonds, flour, bread-crums, citron, orange and lemon peel, a dozen and a half (!) of best eggs, sugar, cream, brandy, wine, nutmeg, allspice, cinnamon, cloves, minced walnut-meats and vanilla. The tying of this in the bag is to be done "with tender solicitude" and then the boiling is begun. The result is something that really justifies the almost prayerful attitude which Dickens takes toward it.

I'D BEEN reading and rereading Dickens for years before it occurred to me, one year, that it would be interesting as well as amusing if we made the Christmas dinner a Dickens Christmas dinner. The recipes, I realized, were right at our hands and the directions were to be found in any of the stories that deal with the great day, though I must admit that there is a prodigality about the dinners which Dickens sets before us that conflicts somewhat with the balanced ration!

The first thing that we proceeded to do, therefore, was to pull out the extension-table and put in all the leaves, for on the festive board there would go the whole dinner, down to the dessert, the cheese and the fruits; lacking some of the liquids appropriate to a dinner which harked back to such "wet" times as those of Dickens, we discovered some old bottles and filled them with grape-juice, and we brought out the big punch-bowl for the little table at the left of the server, on which Cruikshank and other illustrators of the times always show it.

There were some jolly old English hunting scenes in color in the den, and these we transferred to the dining-room, with a gun or two, some fishing-rods and the treasured "sampler" of my grandmother's, with which to replace the usual pictures. Then from the attic and from an old trunk in the storeroom we got out a lot of table furniture which had not seen the light of day for many, many years.

There was the big old soup-tureen with the china ladle to match, and the deep soup-plates, and the revolving "cruet-caster" with its large pepper-and-salt shaker, its mustard-pot and vinegar-cruet. (They didn't use olive-oil on the table in those days.) The silver napkin-rings with the initials were found, and the two that were mounted on small deer—relics of the 1860s—and the silver butterdish, with a glass shelf inside and covered with a little dome. Fortunately, Aunt Martha had kept the "cartwheel" dinner plates that were exactly of the size used by Dickens in his famous dinners, since these were brought from England at the time of which he wrote. She also had the perfectly enormous meat-platter and the big covered vegetable-dishes, with the hole in the cover for the handle of the spoon to stick out, and the cups which had such deep saucers because it was fashionable to pour your tea into this receptacle.

The celery was to go again into grandmother's high goblet, the stalks standing on end in water, and for drinking-glasses we got out the old "tumblers" (for water, or what have you?), and we found the glass pickle-jar with the little fork neatly hung at the side, and the old silver cake-basket, with a handle ornamented with two doves in the act of kissing each other, watched with intense interest from the scrolled rim by two languishing cupids.

IT DIDN'T seem possible that we would be able to find any old clothes to dress up in, but we did. There was a bottle-blue coat with brass buttons for dad, which might have come off that sturdy mariner, Cap'n Cuttle himself. We also made a "stock" for him with a piece of soft linen and brushed his hair up into what we conceived to be a nautical manner. Mother found a basque with puffed sleeves and with a fearful and wonderful arrangement of tucks and smocking and lace for its adornment. With a little lace cap with lavender ribbons on her white curls, she made me think of that little lady in "The Mystery of Edwin Drood," who was so like a china shepherdess that when she and her sister, who looked just like her, sat on opposite sides of the fire, you involuntarily looked with surprize to see how they got down off the mantelpiece. As for me, I had another basque, with a wide lace frill and leg-o'-mutton sleeves, and by courtesy of neighborhood store I had forty cents' worth of little tight curls to hang beside each ear. The four guests were requested to bring "any article of clothing which might have been worn by the people in Dickens's stories," and they appeared with various bits of habiliments, either genuine antiques or manufactured ones, which added greatly to the hilarity.

We set the table with the great big platter for the turkey and the great big dinner-plates and the wee little "butter-plates," an inch and a half in diameter, which were in use for a hundred years before we took to the now fashionable bread-and-butter plate; and with the thin old knives and forks and spoons of great-grandmother Robinson (who had them made out of money when these United States were about to receive the attention of a young novelist who was to go home and write a book called "Martin Chuzzlewit," which made grandmother and grandfather simply purple with rage), and we put on the pickle-jar and the silver butter-dish and the Christmas cakes and the mince pies and the pudding and the nuts and raisins, and we put the old silver and glass fruit-standard (that we hadn't had out of its wrapping for twenty-five years) in the middle and heaped it with all the fruits that we could find. When we stood off and took a good look at our handiwork, we knew why the writers of several generations ago were so fond of saying that the board groaned.

WHEN we sat down, at two-thirty of a Christmas Day (for was that not the popular hour in Dickens' stories?) after having attended divine services (a Dickensian custom fallen into sad desuetude), we presented a surprizingly convincing picture of the Dickens folk. The old pictures and guns on the wall were especially effective, since the genius of the family had succeeded in getting quite a timbered effect by lightly tacking up dark-brown strips of cardboard on the ceiling, as if they were beams.

We began, before the turkey was solemnly brought into his place of honor, by opening our own oysters (which we selected from a great mound of them arranged over a large kitchen-bowl of cracked ice) and by instantly sliding them into the appointed place, a proceeding all the style in Dickens's day. There's something lost for every five minutes that an oyster stays out in a cold and unfriendly world. He needs to be popped from one cozy obscurity to another.

After the oysters the soup-tureen came in, steaming, and made us wonder if we do not make a mistake in not continuing that custom. It's such a comforting-looking thing—a soup-tureen; such a plenteous, generous sort of a thing. It contained the broth, which we had made with a generous quantity of lean beef which we had simmered all the day before with one whole clove and a bay-leaf. On the morning of Christmas day we had added the barley and the onions to the well-strained liquor. It sounds simple and is, but oh, how good! We got away with all of the plateful and would have called, like the immortal Oliver, for "more," if the turkey had not come in, "weeping tears of sage and onions," like the roast leg of pork in the cookshop window, flanked by Cap'n Cuttle's mashed potatoes and supported at the opposite end by that "weal and 'am" pie of Mr. Weller's love. We'd stewed the "weal" with one-third of the quantity of lean ham the day before, and had then enclosed the tasty mess in a good crust, in a big old baking-pan which had held just such a thing, in grandmother's day, many a time. (Yes, yes, I know that a meat pie and oysters and that rich broth and a whopping big turkey are anything but "balanced"—but this is Dickens Day and he never knew or cared whether what he ate was balanced or not, so long as it tasted right).

WELL, and as we could not have the vegetable marrow without which no English dinner was ever quite itself, we had squash. Then there was a big slab of Cheshire cheese with the mince pie, brought on with holly stuck all over it. The getting of that cheese involved all sorts of trouble, for imported French and Italian and Spanish and German and Swedish cheeses are to be had in many places, but the stores which import those of England are not many.

Having eaten generously of the pies, it was obviously impossible to tackle the plum pudding at once. So we tried some of the Christmas songs, "Hark, the Herald Angels Sing," "It Came Upon the Midnight Clear" and "For Auld Lang Syne" and then "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow," and that we ended by drinking a silent toast, all standing. You know who was the subject of the toast.

Then we were about to sit down, when one of our guests discovered that there were several bunches of mistletoe about the table and we had—dear me!—we really had rather an exciting time. It is fun to have a hearty, smacking kiss—on Christmas Day!

So, much relieved and feeling up to the work before us, we sat down to the pudding and to the punch and to the nuts and the raisins and the stories and the oranges and grapes, and to occasional confidential chats with the person at the right or left hand, and to bits of pickle, astonishingly good in the midst of the nuts, and to more punch, until the twilight began to fall softly on us and we sat in it, hushed and strangely touched and feeling suddenly that what had started as a joke had turned into something better than that. Again, it seemed, we had laid actual hands on the Spirit of Christmas which was the familiar of Charles Dickens.

Give Those Little Feet a Fair Start

MOST of the ills to which our feet are heir may be traced to the unwise choice of shoes in childhood.

Simplex Flexies, because they satisfy Nature's requirements, assure the correct development of your youngster's feet during these critical years. In them the foot rests squarely on its natural "three point suspension," the heel, the base of the great toe and the base of the little toe. No chance for the little legs to bow in or out. Soles are so pliable you can bend them with the fingers.

Flexies are glove-smooth inside—without a wrinkle, rough seam or jagged nail-end. They fit perfectly at ankle and instep. Endorsed and prescribed by children's foot specialists.

Ask your dealer about Flexies—and write for free booklets, beautifully illustrated in colors.

THE MIRACLE PLAY COMES BACK

speaking church had drama and religion so met together. The characters are the rich and poor of the Middle Ages, and hosts of angels in Fra Angelica costumes of rose and amber and violet. The play told the old, old story of the beggar who was of little account amidst the pomp and vanities of the world, but who at the end passed through the radiant gates that were shut against the rich who were surly and selfish. Swelling music, lights that grew ever toward a great finale, and a concluding tableau of triumphant color and glory marked the setting of this drama, which had been scheduled to play for a week, but which occupied the church for three full weeks, so great was its effect upon the congregation and so eager were people to see it. It had all the splendor of Reinhardt's "Miracle" and yet was produced for a sum so small that Miss Craig hesitates to have it named in print! This is what can be accomplished when art and knowledge meet.

Just as this play is the pinnacled example of what can be accomplished in a city church, so "The Nativity," by Rosamond Kimball, first acted in a little town in New Jersey, has become the American classic of the country church on account of its beauty and its simplicity, its atmosphere of wonder and of reverence.

(It may be parenthetically remarked that there is only one other play that approaches it in widespread appeal, and that is a secular piece written about a church, which can be produced only in a church, and which presupposes that the chancel is decorated with Christmas greens. This is that tender, homespun idyl, "The Old Peabody Pew," by Kate Douglas Wiggin, first acted in the Tory Hill Church in Buxton, Maine, and since then in hundreds of other churches.)

Miss Kimball's play, on the other hand, is purely biblical. It relates the story of the Nativity, beginning with a scene in the Temple, followed by a lovely brief tableau of the Annunciation, and passing from that to the Shepherds in the field, and lastly giving the scene in the Manger. The first two scenes may be omitted if desired. Selections from the Bible, read by a reader, form the main part of the play—the other characters have very little to say, and the choral singing is done by the congregation. This makes the play exceedingly easy to produce.

This play can be given by any denomination. There is no royalty to be paid for its performance. It comes in an attractive paper-bound edition, costing little more than a Christmas card. It was originally written for children and young people, but the dignity of its language and scenes has caused it to be produced by adults as well. It does not require acting skill, but depends on the lovely poses of the chief participants and the diction of the all-important reader.

AS ORDER is Heaven's first law, so the organizing of the play must be the first thought. There should be a dramatic director, a scenic director, a costume director, a light director and a music director—all chosen for their gifts in these particular lines.

In a rural church the person with the most talent or experience along the lines of producing should be the director of the church play. Sometimes this person is the minister. Yet do not hesitate to go outside the church if outside talent is needed. Are there not gifted people in the nearest agricultural college, normal school or high school who will be glad to cooperate?

As soon as the director has read the play, he or she should go quietly and alone to the church and map out where the exits and entrances can best be made—plan out the whole play from the beginning, just where all the people are to be, and write it down. It may be written in a separate book, or along the margin of the play book.

Next the director confers with the scenic director and the lighting director, and together they see where the curtains shall be hung and how the scenes shall be lighted. After this there is a conference with the costume director, and last of all the music director. As soon as it is known what music is needed, it should be sent for promptly. When the congregation is to sing the chorals, the church choir should also practise them, and lead the congregation in singing them.

At the first rehearsal the cast should assemble and read the play aloud, correcting all faults of diction as they go and getting the full meaning of the text.

Rehearsals, as a rule, take place in the church. Only the cast should be present, and it should assemble promptly. There should be no whispering or talking while the rehearsals proceed. For a simple play six rehearsals will be enough.

TWO kinds of background are possible and practical in church production—screens and curtains strung on wires or rods. The scenic director will choose the type best adapted to the size and kind of church.

Sturdily made screens are best suited to a church where no curtains can be hung and no screws driven into wall or floor. Burlap or denim is used to cover them. On occasion two sides can be covered, thus making two backgrounds. The green denim side is used for the shepherds on the hillside and the brown denim side is used for the stable.

These frames should have uprights behind them, as a picture-frame has, so that they will stand firmly and not "topple" at an unforeseen moment. If reversible screens are used, the reversing of them should be practised, so that there will be no confusion. In fact, it is often well to have a screen rehearsal, placing and replacing them till all goes like clockwork. The screens should be six and a half feet high.

In covering the screens, place them flat on the floor, stretch the material tautly across them, and tack it to the edges. The inch or half inch protruding beyond the tacks should be glued to the wood. It is often possible to drape curtains over the screens, quickly removing them as the scenes change. Old-gold Canton flannel can be draped over dark screens, and will give the effect of a temple, as Miss Kimball suggests.

Curtains hung on wires can usually be stretched across the church facing the front pews and thus hide the scenes of the play till it begins. These curtains should be hung on rings, move easily, and part in the middle.

For curtain backgrounds use either denim or Canton flannel. A little church that could not afford enough draperies in one color to make an effective background for the Manger scene had the Christmas committee collect all the brown burlap potato sacks that the congregation could give them and sewed them into long curtains, using the strongest brown shoe-thread. The dark brown made an excellent background for the stable wall. With a wooden manger, straw underfoot, and a light shining on Mary in her blue robe, the humble experiment proved its worth.

Where a pulpit can not be moved and must be hidden, drape over it some dark neutral-tinted cloth. With pine-trees placed against it, it becomes equally part of the Shepherd scene and of the Manger scene. Focus the light away from it rather than toward it.

While the rehearsals are going forward the costumes are being planned. These can be made of the simplest material—Canton flannel, cheese-cloth and dyed mosquito-netting. Old curtains often prove invaluable, while unbleached muslin can be dyed in lovely colors and easily stenciled. Oilcloth gilded with radiator gold or silver paint becomes magnificent under light. In her book "Religious Drama" Martha Candler wisely says that unless the costume director is exceedingly expert, wings and halos for angels should be avoided. Better a gold band across the brow than a wobbly halo. Do not have the costumes of the Angels "bunchy." They should fall in lovely straight lines. For footgear, dyed cotton stockings can be worn over shoes if necessary.

To make a good color scheme for a Nativity play, Mary should wear Madonna blue, with a white veil draped about it; Joseph might wear a tan tunic with a darker tan over-robe. His hair and beard should be white. White cotton batting on a skull-cap will serve.

While the Shepherds wear earth colors—different shades of brown burlap or sacking—each Shepherd should be differentiated. Have one with a leopard skin hung from his shoulders. This is made by painting or inking dark spots on orange-colored Canton flannel. The second Shepherd may wear a sheepskin made of cotton batting. For the third Shepherd have a fur piece caught at his shoulders and hanging down his back (any neck-piece will do). Their legs and arms are bare. Sandals and strappings can be made of brown oilcloth. Some Nativity plays have put the Shepherds in turbans, but sturdy men of that type look better bareheaded. Instead of crooks they can carry wooden staves.

The Wise Men should suggest Eastern gorgeousness. The first Wise Man may wear an orange tunic, a black coat lined in pale yellow, and have a long necklace of jewels. Small Christmas-tree baubles will do. He has a golden crown.

The second Wise Man wears an orchid-colored tunic and a purple over-robe with a deep ermine border (white cotton batting with black spots painted on it).

The third Wise Man is a Nubian with a brown skin. He should wear a crimson tunic and a cloth-of-gold over-robe of gilded oil-cloth. He carries a censer filled with incense. He has a gold-and-crimson turban; also huge gold earrings, made of brass curtain-rings, and bare brown arms on which gleam golden armlets made of corrugated cardboard, gilded, two inches wide. He should wear as many chains as possible. Where enough beads are not obtainable, macaroni cut in one-inch lengths and painted gold or silver is excellent. Paint it scantily, so it will not soften.

In a church production, with the exception of the very dark Nubian King and the weather-beaten faces of the Shepherds, no make-up should be used save the faintest rose on the cheeks of Mary and the Angel, lest under the rays of artificial light their pallor should become too startling. But lipsticks or eyebrow-pencils are unthinkable in a church production. So is fantastic fussy hair-dressing. The hair of the Angels should be worn floating. Bobbed hair that is parted in the middle, with a gold band about the brow, gives the look of a medieval angel, and can be quite charming.

THE color scheme of the costumes should be worked out in advance. Biblical pictures should be consulted. If the local library contains a copy of Tissot's "Life of Christ," it will be found a mine of reference. There is also a New York publishing house which can supply colored costume designs on cards that cost one and one-half cents each, not including postage.

Before any money is expended for material, get samples and try out the colors by the lights you are going to use in the final representation of the play. Under artificial light blue may turn green and purple may turn black, and the color scheme be destroyed.

Before the dress rehearsal, have a rehearsal of the lights, and use them again at the dress rehearsal. Half the beauty of the play depends on them.

The costume director should keep two lists. The first list should contain a description of all costumes that have been borrowed and their owners' names, so that they can be returned promptly. The second list should be one of expenditure.

Do not leave the details of costumes to the last moment. Have everything in readiness. If no actual dressing-rooms can be arranged in the church vestry, have two in the parish church or in a house near by.

Costumes in a biblical play should not look mussy or creased. They should be well pressed and hung on clothes-hangers before the play takes place. If certain borrowed portières have been stored away in attics, see that they are well aired before using them. Do not bring the smell of tar-paper or moth-balls into a church which should be redolent of pine and the odor of frankincense.

Christmas is the season of good-will. Why not share the play as widely as possible? The players in a little town in Illinois take their Christmas church-play through a circuit of towns, always preserving the spirit of reverence and devotion.

Merry Christmas to you and to your play!

With all meats—the tasty, tonic fruit!

Cranberry Sauce goes fine with all meats—hot or cold. It is the one touch needed to give balance to the ordinary diet. The best Cranberry Sauce can be made in ten minutes—and here's the recipe:

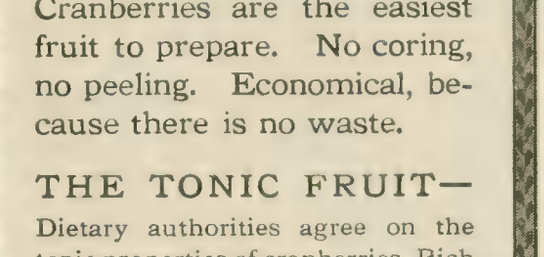
Ten-Minute Cranberry Sauce

1 pound (4 cups) cranberries, 2 cups boiling water, 1½ to 2 cups sugar (¾ to 1 pound). Boil sugar and water together for five minutes; skim; add the cranberries and boil without stirring (five minutes is usually sufficient) until all the skins are broken. Remove from the fire when the popping stops.

There's nothing handier for tempting desserts than 10-minute Cranberry Sauce. The ideal filling for pies, puddings, tarts, jelly roll and shortcake.

Cranberries are the easiest fruit to prepare. No coring, no peeling. Economical, because there is no waste.

THE TONIC FRUIT—



Dietary authorities agree on the tonic properties of cranberries. Rich in iron, lime and carbohydrates - the vital elements that aid in restoring nerves and building up the system.

To be sure of getting the choicest cultivated varieties, ask for EATMOR CRANBERRIES. The trademark label is on every box and barrel.

Always cook cranberries in enameled, porcelain-lined or aluminum vessels.

WHERE IS MY FATHER?

hand, rusted to dissolution by its years in the weather. She touched it here and there and it fell away until there was a great opening. She drew a deep breath and stepped into the stable-yard.

At the stable-door she paused, resting one hand against the frame, peering into the dusky interior. She heard a horse munching corn and she lifted her foot and stepped into the stable. The horse was just beyond, in another stall, but before her was the manger she had seen from the wire wall, and she hurried to it, standing on tiptoe and trying to look into it, for she was sure her sweet brother Jesus must be there in the manger. She put her hands on the manger's edge and drew herself up.

"Well, now! What now, kid?" a voice exclaimed, and she dropped to her feet and turned, her heart rat-a-patting furiously. She looked into a browned and bearded face, the face of a man leaning on a pitchfork, but it was not a frightening face; the eyes twinkled and the mouth smiled. The man came forward a step or two, more into the light. "What do you want, young lady?" he asked.

"I'm Vidda," she said.

"You are, are you?" he smiled. "Well, that's news. And whereabouts do you come from, if you're Vidda and all that?"

"I'm from Miss Anne's," she cried, "through the hole in the wire wall there," and she pointed behind her. "I came to see my little brother Jesus in the manger."

"Well, now," said the bearded man, "as a matter of fact——"

HE DID not have time to finish what he meant to say, for Vidda spoke again. She was not brave to speak; but she was not at all afraid of this bearded man.

"Are you my Father who art in heaven?" she asked him.

For answer he put aside the pitchfork, leaning it against the side of the stall, and got down on one knee, and spoke to her.

"Come here, young one," he said, "and let me have a look at you. My goodness, you're a big girl, ain't you! And you come right through the wire fence, hey? You come from Miss Anne's, over yonder, did you? And what did you say you came for?"

"To see if my sweet little baby brother Jesus was in the manger," Vidda repeated, "because I want to see Him."

"Well, now, let me tell you about that," said the bearded man. "You and me had better talk that over. What made you think He would be in my manger? Who told you that?"

"He was born in a manger," Vidda said, "and I saw the manger through the wire wall, because the leaves are all gone. I thought He would be here. Is He?"

"No, I'm afraid He ain't here, girl," the bearded man said. "It was a different stable He was born in—a long way from here, over in another country altogether. You just got things mixed a little."

"And aren't you my Father who art in heaven?" Vidda asked, and her eyes showed her disappointment which was very great.

"No. And you oughtn't even to think such a thing. You just don't understand, I take it. How come you ever thought things like that?"

So, sitting on her heels before him, Vidda told him as well as she could. It was not easy to understand. He could not gather what the freckles had to do with it, for instance, and it was hard for Vidda to make that clear.

"Now, wait!" he said again and again. "Give me a minute to get that clear," or "You poor kid! Think of that, now!" and finally he said: "You'd better go home now and run around and play, you're getting all cold and shivery," so Vidda went back through the hole in the wire wall, but after this first visit she returned to the stable every day through the hole in the wire wall. Some days there were men other than her friend there and often there were more horses or huge self-driven trucks or smaller self-driven trucks. At such times the bearded man could give Vidda little attention. She stood safely in some corner, or he lifted her to the top of some great box or even to the seat of one of the trucks, but as soon as he had time he came and talked with her. At times, as he talked with her, his eyes twinkled at her questions and he smiled at her answers, but sometimes when he asked her questions about Miss Anne her answers made him quite serious. Whenever Vidda talked with him of her Father who art in heaven and her gentle little brother Jesus—for she could not believe the bearded man was entirely right about them—his words were few and his voice was soft. There were times, though, when he was downright angry with one or another of the truckmen, and then he cursed roundly.

"Scare you that time?" he would ask, coming back to Vidda with a grin. "I got to break loose once in a while, but don't you worry!"

"I won't," Vidda promised.

ONE evening when Vidda was in bed and sound asleep, there came a rap at the door of the shut-in house and the grandmother went to open it. She came into the room where Anne was sitting, and she looked at her anxiously.

"It's Joe Martin, Anne," the grandmother said. "He says he wants to see you."

"Send him about his business! I won't see him. I'll see nobody."

"But he won't go," the grandmother said. "He has a package in his hands. He says he has a Christmas present for Vidda. I told him to go, but he wouldn't. He put his foot over the sill. Anne—Vidda has been going to his stable, through a hole in the wire."

"For that I'll punish her," Anne said, "but I will not see Joseph Martin or any other man."

"I don't just see how you can help it, Anne, seeing I came right in," said Joseph Martin, standing in the doorway. Anne arose from her chair, cold-eyed and erect.

"How dare you!" she cried. "There's the door. Go!"

He had on cleaner clothes than Vidda had ever seen him wear, and a barber had evened the edges of his beard, but he was still a huge rough man, browned and heavy-handed. He could not take his eyes from Anne's face, but he put his parcel on the table—a parcel with the boneless legs of a doll hanging through the paper—and held his hat in his hand.

"I thought I'd come over," he said, "Christmas time, and I thought I'd see if you'd let me give that little tike a present."

"You're not wanted here," Anne said, "neither you nor your presents."

"Well, no, I guess that's so," Joseph Martin said. "Only—here I am and as long as I'm here I guess I'll say what I came to say."

"You coward!" Anne cried.

"Well, no—not that anyway," said Joseph Martin. "You don't know how I had to argue with myself to get myself to come or you wouldn't say that. What I braced myself up with was the little tike—Vidda, she says her name is. I come on her account—mostly. And now I'm here, Anne, I'm going to say my say."

He waited a moment. Anne might have fled up-stairs, but she did not. Perhaps it was not in her nature to run away—perhaps she did not think of that avenue of escape. She stood facing him with her head high, but with more than the usual color on her face, and in the corner the grandmother lowered herself into a chair and sat looking at them.

"What I want, just like I wanted long ago and all the time, is for you to marry me," Joseph Martin said.

"Not in a thousand years!" Anne declared, coloring more.

"Well, now, let's not put it just that way," said Joseph Martin with a rather wry smile. "Say not more than once in a thousand years. I like you now, Anne, just like I always did, and you know that, and what's past is gone and that's all there is to that. But this little whippet of a girl—she's not gone. And, Anne, want to or not want to, I'm going to marry you!"

"Is that all? Are you through now?" she asked him.

"She came through a hole in the wire fence," Joseph Martin said, not taking his eyes from Anne's face, "to my stable—the poor pitiful little thing—and she says to me 'Are you my Father who art in heaven?' 'Why do you say that?' I asked her. 'Because that's the only kind of father I can have,' she says, 'I haven't any other father and I'm not decent unless I have one, so I have to have Him, and have the dear little baby Jesus for my brother.' Looking for the dear little baby Jesus in my manger, that's what brought her through the hole in the fence, Anne. I don't know how hard you've got, Anne, but I couldn't stand it. Coming to me because she needed a father so much; the poor kid coming to my stable to find her Father who art in heaven! Anne——"

WHERE IS MY FATHER?

She looked at him steadily, but she did not answer.

"You've hardened yourself, that's what's the matter with you," he said roughly. "I can see the little tike crouched down by the fence peeking through it at the fathers on the other side, if you can't, and mourning for a father of her own that you ain't ever going to give her. And it's sure to be harder on her all the time, harder every year from now on. And no fault of hers."

"You have no right to say this," Anne said.

"No fault of hers," Joseph Martin repeated. "And no fault of mine, for there I am all the while, waiting. And you know it, Anne. Not much, maybe, and a rough old hairy specimen, but there I am all the time, as you know. And she ain't that particular, the little tike ain't. I'm good enough sort of father to satisfy her. So here I am, and that's my say and I've said it. Only, if you say 'There's the door!' to me, I've got to patch the fence. I can't stand having her come father-hunting, looking at me like she does, and I can't do anything about it. Especially along about now——"

"Christmas time," chirped the grandmother from her corner.

"You said it, ma'am!" said Joseph Martin, turning to her.

"I guess I'll go up," said the grandmother. "Time I was in bed. Good night all."

She gathered her sewing into a ball and went up the stairs.

"WELL, Anne?" Joseph Martin asked, but still Anne said nothing. Her hands twisted where she had clasped them, but she did not speak. "What I thought," Joseph Martin went on, more diffidently now that they were alone, "was that it don't make much difference where I am. One place is as good as another to me in the trucking-line. And she's young yet. If we got married and went some considerable distance away from here—anywhere you'd say—she might kind of forget she never had a father. She might come to think I was always him. I dare say it's plumb foolish of me, but I thought maybe you might sort of give me to her—give me to her as a kind of a Christmas present, as you might say, Anne."

He waited. Her proud head lowered a little.

"No! No! I'm sorry, but it can't be," she said.

"Well—it's for you to say," Joseph Martin said. "That's all then, I guess. I'll be going along."

He turned and went to the door and out, and Anne stood motionless a moment until she heard the stairs creak and she turned and saw Vidda, nightgowned and barefooted, shading her eyes from the lamp's glare and staring eagerly into the room.

"Where is my father?" she asked, looking everywhere. "Did my father go away? I want my father. Grandmother said my father was down here, and I want him. Where is he, mother?"

"Oh, Vidda, Vidda!" Anne cried and hid her face in her hands, but before the clock had ticked twice she was running to the door. She threw it open and called, "Joe! Joe, come back here! Joe, come back!"

"Right here!" answered Vidda's Christmas present, close at hand and heartily as a father should.

big drum for the march. He went into paroxysms of laughter and as soon as he could speak he exclaimed, "A drum? Well I should smile. What'll yer hev next? This is a h-ll of a school." In telling this story Mrs. Wiggin always asked that the profanity be pardoned as it was mild compared with other things the little ragamuffins said. Of course we all wanted to see the boy who played the drum! Then there was Mary Mulligan who said, when the Christmas tree was being trimmed, "I wouldn't be afeard to say 'Merry Christmas' to God—He ain't cross." Of course we wanted to see Mary! There was Jack Mulligan also. One day he said to Joe Bragg, "You're chewin' gum again," to which Joe replied, "Well, Miss Kate ain't lookin'."

"Well, God'll see yer, sure enough—yer know that, Joe Bragg."

"Aw, God can't tell."

"Yer needn't be so sure, Joe Bragg. Yer bet yer life He'll stand by Miss Kate." (Perhaps it should be explained that this was before Mrs. Wiggin was married, and when she was Miss Kate Smith.) We all were eager to see Jack and Joe!

There was an open lot opposite the school building on Silver Street where the children went frequently to play their kindergarten games. It was a merry sight as they formed into line, marshaled by "Miss Kate," and marched from their room to the playground. It was also an exciting occasion, for, as Mrs. Wiggin used to describe it, "The pickets of the high fence would be adorned plenteously with boys of all ages in a wild state of curiosity, the sidewalks crowded with nurses, baby carriages, and small children with their mothers; Chinese venders of vegetables stopped in the street dumb with astonishment, and trucks, express and grocery wagons were all drawn up to discover the mystery."

Of course back of this were hard work and much weariness; but nevertheless each Christmas was a holiday, and every day was a high day with Kate Douglas Wiggin at the Silver Street Kindergarten in San Francisco.

IN THESE years, whatever other Christmas celebrations we may have had, Mrs. Wiggin and her family always came to our house on Christmas day for dinner. Eagerly did we look forward to the hour when they would come joyously to the house with a gaiety unsurpassed by any of our other friends. They would call as they came through the front door, "Here we all are, as hungry as bears. We hope the turkey is large and that there is plenty of cranberry sauce."

When we were all seated at the dinner-table, Mrs. Wiggin was likely to bring out a poem written for us, witty and amusing, touching and lovely by turns, and she read it during a pause of the dinner. If she read, there was sure to be a pause, for our beloved Delia, who waited on our table for over twenty years, could not go on with her work, but had to listen with rapt attention, as did we all when there came the signal from one of the younger children, "Mrs. Katie has something to read to us."

HIGH DAYS AND HOLIDAYS

I wish I had those verses that you might have the joy of reading them, and that I, too, might refresh my memory of their cleverness and sweetness. How they have disappeared I do not know, but they have been lost or misplaced in the many movings of Mrs. Wiggin's family and ours across the continent from one ocean to another.

One Christmas time we received the following answer to our usual invitation to her to pass Christmas day with us:

DEAR MRS. STEBBINS:
Yours received, hence these lines:

Among the Smiths there is a girl,
(Tho' she is no relation)
Called Bessie Smith, from Santa B—
Who at solicitation
Doth Christmas spend among us here,
It being her vacation.
And now as we have just received
Your most kind invitation
We want to know if she can come
With us to the collation.
She's tall and very, very slim,
She needs a slender ration.
Please, Lucy, can she come along
With us, say on probation?
If it should seem to be a sort
Of mammoth deputation,
Why, just confess it like a man,
'Twill cause no irritation.
But then, at most, we're only five,
I'll try conciliation,
And if the turkey getteth short
We'll stick to "vegetation."
So crush our hopes at once, we pray,
Or send us consolation.
If you refuse, we'll murder do,
Decrease the population,
For what is Bessie Smith against
The prospect of starvation!
If you accept, we all declare
Without dissimulation
We'll sound your praises all abroad
Through every Christian nation.
Yours, KATE.

It is needless to say that the "only five" were welcomed with open arms, and the more only made Christmas the merrier.

Another "High Day" (or was it a "Low Day" for me?) is connected with fried hasty pudding, the kind the king and queen had for supper and the queen next morning fried. To this day, high or low, I can not look a dish of it in the face without blushing and laughing at the same time. I am inordinately fond of it when it is made in the right way—that is, in the queen's way. But at the particular moment of which I am writing our cook either would not or could not make it. I mentioned this fact to Mrs. Wiggin one day and she said, "We often have it for breakfast. Come to-morrow morning and we will give you some." Of course I said I would, but—I overslept! When I awoke, it was too late for breakfast anywhere. It was before the days of telephones, and Mrs. Wiggin could not call up our house to know what had become of me. All the family could do was simply to wait until the coffee was too strong, the eggs overdone, the rolls burnt and the fried hasty pudding just a cold mess. The breakfast for the family was spoiled, and I feared that their tempers would be spoiled also. I did not dare show myself at their door during the day or night. The next morning, wo betide, my father received the following bill, which nearly scared me out of my wits until I saw how funny it was. It ran as follows:

REV. HORATIO STEBBINS, D.D.
We venture to send the following acc't to you, not knowing to a certainty whether your son is a minor or Major.*

You would think that Mrs. Wiggin would never have tried to do anything for me again. But years after, when all was forgiven but by no means forgotten, for the family liked to harp on that discordant string, Mrs. Wiggin procured for me a cat. Perhaps she knew that I disliked cats as much as I had liked corn-meal mush, and this was the way she was going to get even with me. But clever as she was she learned that Gang aft a-gley.

The cat was to be given to me when I arrived at Quillcote and I imagine that half the fun was to see what I would do with it, but before I arrived I received this missive. On the envelope in Mrs. Wiggin's writing were these words: "We had procured a cat to cheer you on your arrival. The operation was attended with great trouble and expense. The enclosed is the result!" Inside was the following account of the elusive cat:

Quillcote, August 22nd.

BEFORE the days of motor-cars, Quillcote was the most inaccessible of places. But when one arrived at Quillcote, one quite forgot all the inconveniences, the delays and the changes in getting there, so happy was one to reach such a destination. One of those happy times I remember in particular. I had just returned from Europe and for the few days that remained of my vacation I went to Hollis for a brief visit. Mrs. Wiggin wrote me that the family could not meet me at the station, but their "astral bodies" would be there and I could hire "a rig from Dan Palmer." I was to have "room and board" in the home of Mrs. Jane Akers, whom Mrs. Wiggin, in "My Garden of Memory," speaks of as "vigorous, plain-spoken, straightforward, a little hard to please, but loyal to the bone," and the house as "fine and square, with the twin elms in front, the pine forest almost opposite, and the unequaled stretch of western sky for sunsets." It was to such a place that Dan Palmer drove me, and Mrs. Akers showed me to the large room in the front of the house. What was my consternation, on entering the room, to find it decorated with notes of advice and of caution in regard to what I should and should not do. My heart was burning within me to tell some one all that I had seen and done while I had been abroad. I just wanted to talk and I think I did not care to whom, provided I could find a sympathetic listener. The first ominous sight that greeted my eye was a large New England dinner-horn tied by a ribbon to the casing of the open window. On the ribbon was a note containing these devastating words, "Pour your full heart into the dinner-horn. It will harm naught but the grasses." As I looked about further I discovered a card pinned to the mantelpiece with "Travel improves the mind but wears out the shoes." On the footboard of the bed was a pad and pencil labeled "My impressions of London." To the pillow was fastened a set of ivory tablets, marked "What I know about England." There were pens and ink on the table and a list of the places I had visited, with spaces beneath marked "Notes on." But worst of all, for by this time I was almost dying of hunger, on the inside of the door was a large placard reading, "When you have set down

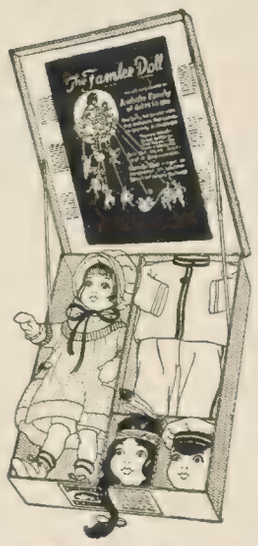
What Great Joy On Christmas Morn

LITTLE Daughter is counting the days to Christmas. She just can't wait to see her wonderful gifts from dear Santa Claus. You can be sure she will be up bright and early Christmas morn and come bounding into the room where her many presents are displayed beneath the gayly decorated tree.

Just picture her surprise and great joy if good old Santa has left her a magical Famlee Family—the lifelike, unbreakable, walking, talking Dollie who first is a petite black hair French Girl and presto! in a moment becomes a happy rollicking Clown. Then a jolly Sailor Girl. Or a brave and bold Naval Commander. Then perhaps a brown-cheeked Indian Girl.



When Missie wants to change her Famlee Doll into "someone else" she just replaces head and clothes, and in a twinkling makes whatever character she wishes. And such fun, amusement, interest! changing 'round from any one to any other.

3 to 12 Changeable Characters

Famlee Families come in various sizes. Sets of three, five, seven or twelve changeable characters—New Born Infant, Scotch Lassie, Peter Pan, Little Red Riding Hood and many others. A whole family of dolls in one.

Each character is lovable and lifelike, from head to toe. Stands 16 inches high. Walks and talks. Unbreakable. Quality construction throughout.

At Stores or by Mail

Set No. 311 illustrated above—French Girl, Naval Commander and Indian Girl—is $6.00. Five character set No. 509 (with five costumes) is $8.50. See the various Famlee Sets at department or toy stores. If you cannot get them, send direct to us, enclosing $8.50 for Set No. 509 or $6.00 for Set No. 311, and it will be mailed to you prepaid on approval for five days' examination. If you are not totally satisfied your money will be refunded without question. (Sent C. O. D. if preferred.)

HIGH DAYS AND HOLIDAYS

all your impressions of European travel, come down to supper, but not 'til then." I plucked up courage and went down to supper, in spite of this warning, and said to Mrs. Wiggin that as she had just returned from her own first visit to Europe she naturally wanted to do all the European-talking herself.

This reminds me of Mrs. Wiggin's amusing way of placing epigrams, verses, words of caution or advice in her house, "Quillcote," Hollis, Maine, which she occupied in the Summer. When she bought the place, it was entirely without modern conveniences. All the water used in the house was pumped as needed by hand into the kitchen. After living in this primitive fashion for a Summer or two, Mrs. Wiggin had a bathroom added, but still the water had to be pumped by hand. However, a tank had been built and a boy engaged to do the pumping. The supply of water was of course limited and in order to advise her guests of the fact Mrs. Wiggin posted the following notice on the bathroom door:

FOR THE NEW BATHROOM AT QUILLCOTE

Stranger, the bathroom tank is high
'Neath attic roofs beneath the sky.
The boy who pumps is very small
And does not love to pump at all,
So pray be saving of the water
And use no more than you had oughter.
The morning baths are rather cool
Suggesting icy mountain pool;
But if you like an evening rub
At nine you'll find a red-hot tub.
Still, stranger, wheresoe'er you roam
There is no place for baths like home.

The sale of Mrs. Wiggin's books in England was much stimulated by her semi-public readings, which she has described in "My Garden of Memory." She continued those readings here at home, and one of the first was in Portland, Maine. Under the influence of this great occasion, I wrote the following verses which amused her greatly:

O Katie's gone to Portland town
To read her pleasant works,
Clad in a yellow satin gown
And hair done up in quirks.
She's won the hearts of noblemen,
Brought peasants to her feet,
By stories from her facile pen
And turns of phrases neat.
But still she is the same dear girl,
This many times I've said,
A trifle more her hair may curl
But level is her head.

PERHAPS the best nonsense of all, but the most difficult to describe, was "The McGibeny Familee." This family was supposed to be a famous theatrical troupe which traveled about the country giving their entertainments at private houses at fabulous prices. At least this was what was noised abroad throughout the Hollis countryside. It was said that the services of this famous family were very difficult to obtain. They demanded a large sum of money for a single performance, but this must be paid by the hostess, while all the guests were to be invited, and no tickets sold and no money taken at the door. These facts were whispered from one house to another in the little village of Salmon Falls, and when it was further rumored that this distinguished company of artists was likely to give one of their classical entertainments at Quillcote, every head in the village was agog with excitement and the hope of receiving an invitation.

Finally the rumor became a fact, and every one in the little village from Aunt Hannah Dunn and Aunt Susan Swett to the boy who milked the cows and mowed the grass received an invitation to the effect that Mrs. Wiggin would be glad to see them at her house on a certain evening when her friends Mr. and Mrs. McGibeny and their five children, known in the theatrical world as "The McGibeny Familee," in response to an urgent request from Mrs. Wiggin and because of their devotion to her, would give one of their unique "soirées" in the dining-room at Quillcote. No one knew what a "soirée" was, but that served only to pique curiosity. It was further hinted that on a certain afternoon any one who happened to be at the post-office on the arrival of the stage with its passengers and the mail might have a glimpse of some members of the McGibeny Family as they descended from the coach. The hint bore fruit, and that afternoon the steps of the post-office were blocked with men who could leave their haying and women who could leave their housework, the neighboring trees were full of children thick as crows and as curious, all bent on seeing first a sample of this famous family. They were not disappointed, for when the stage drew up, the same stage in which Rebecca later traveled to Sunnybrook Farm, and the driver had thrown nonchalantly the bag of mail to the platform, there emerged from the inside of the coach two charming young women. At least every one said they were charming, though their faces were heavily veiled. Every one said also that they must be the Misses McGibeny. No one seemed to recognize the young ladies as they hastened down the street without stopping to speak to any one and merely acknowledging stares by a gracious bow now and then. Nor did any one guess that the "Misses McGibeny" had only a few moments before dressed at Quillcote and intercepted the stage a short distance up the road.

THERE were gales of laughter at Quillcote when they told of their successful reception at the post-office (nothing was ever more successful everybody declared), and then we set to work to complete the preparations for the evening. Costumes, chairs, screens, tables, hangings, rugs, every conceivably useful thing for the performance was dragged from its accustomed place and put into the dining-room. This was before the days of the "Barn," and the dining-room, later converted into the sitting-room, had to be used for all festive occasions.

The preparations were barely complete before the guests began to arrive. A suspicion had evidently arisen in the minds of some that "The McGibeny Familee" was not entirely what it pretended to be, but nobody said anything about suspicions, though a few here and there looked knowing.

When the company had arrived and all who could be seated on chairs, stools or on "any old thing" were quiet, while others, standing, packed the doorway, the performance began. The entire "Familee" was heard singing in another room to the tune of "Oh, Susanna" these words written for the occasion by "K. D. W."

I had a dream de oder night
When ebry ting was still,
I tought I saw de McGibeny Familee
A comin' down de hill.
All walkin' in a row,
Wid a big banjo,
Dat family passed me by;
Such a high-toned style,
Such a fascinatin' smile,
I nebber did espy.

Refrain

Oh, Susanna,
Doan' you cry fer me,
For I'm gwine up along
To de Pine Tree State
For to see de McGibeny Familee.

With the second verse, the "Familee" appeared and walked or rather pranced about the room singing:

Dey wasn't much for looks
But dey'd written lots o' books
An' dey sang like
De bird on de tree,
Susanna, lemme go
To de Quillcote show
For to see de McGibeny Familee.

Refrain

Dere was Mary, dere was Cissy,
Dere was Trotty, dere was Hat,
Oh, you'd ought to ha see em swing.
Brignoli in de middle
Wid his big bass fiddle
And de fader and de mudder in de ring.
Oh, Susanna, doan you cry fer me,
For I'm goin' up along
To de Pine Tree State
For to see de McGibeny Familee,
For to see de McGibeny Familee.

Of course when the "Familee" appeared in person the secret was out, for there was Mrs. Wiggin herself as Mrs. McGibeny and all the other members of the "Familee" were impersonated by friends, every one of whom is mentioned in "My Garden of Memory." Mr. McGibeny was there, of course, and his son Brignoli McGibeny, and his four charming daughters, Harriet Beecher Stowe McGibeny, Mary Anderson McGibeny, Cissy Loftus McGibeny and Trotty McGibeny, a tall, lovely girl dressed for the occasion in short skirts and pantalets.

Mrs. McGibeny presided at the piano, played the accompaniments for all the songs and choruses, while Mr. McGibeny did feats of strength and skill. Brignoli McGibeny sang a song about "Susan Brown" with interruptions from the family. Cissy Loftus McGibeny, none other than "Sally None-Such" whom Mrs. Wiggin mentions so admiringly in "My Garden of Memory," sang a song about "Angeline, the belle of Hollis Town." The words were by Mrs. Wiggin. Harriet Beecher Stowe McGibeny then appeared with her arms full of books, "her works," from which she proposed to read without time-limit. Her sisters and brother protested and said, "You know, Hat, your works are awful dull." But Hat insisted in contributing something that she considered "uplifting," until Cissy broke in singing:

Just tell them that you saw me,
And they will know the rest,
Just tell them that you saw me feeling well.

This silenced the insistent Harriet. Mary Anderson McGibeny sang charmingly the beautiful song, "I will give you the keys of my heart." Trotty McGibeny, the infant phenomenon, was then pushed forward by her admiring parents, who said that they had reserved the best for the last, and that their dear little one, who would make her first and probably her last appearance in public, would recite a little poem. Trotty came reluctantly forward and after much promptings from her anxious mother began, but she could get no further and, dissolved in tears, had to be dragged ignominiously from the stage.

Twinkle, twinkle, little star,

All through the performance Mrs. Wiggin as Mrs. McGibeny sat in rapt admiration of everything that was said and done by her family. She palpitated with emotion over the sentimental songs. Her bosom swelled with pride at the accomplishments, intellectual and otherwise, of her daughters. She was thrilled and awed by the physical prowess of Mr. McGibeny. She was convulsed with laughter at the absurdities of her son, Brignoli, and as for the innocence and charm of Trotty, she was quite beside herself with maternal affection.

When the entertainment was over, hot gingerbread and baked sweet apples and cream followed and as the friends departed they declared, as was said of the Ruggles family in "The Birds' Christmas Carol" that "they had never seen such happiness in the space of three hours."

SPEAKING of "The Birds' Christmas Carol," this brings up another Christmas scene, perhaps the most characteristic of all. At least it seems so to me as seen through the vistas of the years.

Mrs. Wiggin had written this story which was to be privately printed and sold for the benefit of the Silver Street Kindergarten.

In this modest form it achieved such a success that it was later published and is now read all over the world. Next to "A Christmas Carol," by Charles Dickens, it is perhaps the most widely-known and best-loved Christmas story in the English language.

Mrs. Wiggin dedicated it to "the three dearest children in the world, Bertha, Horatio and Lucy." Bertha is her niece, Horatio and Lucy are my brother and sister. One Christmas eve before the story was actually in print Mrs. Wiggin came to our house to read it aloud. I can see her now as she sat on an old-fashioned hassock before the open fire in our living-room in San Francisco. Her hair was golden in those days and the light from the blazing logs made it look like an aureole. My brother and sister, little folks, cuddled closely up to her and hung upon her every word. They made a charming picture, a beautiful young woman reading to children who loved her a story of her own which was to become famous all over the world. While she read, the Christmas spirit filled the room and the angelic chorus "Peace on earth, good will toward men" echoed in all our hearts.

As I look back upon this lovely scene, I realize how fraught with meaning simple events may be. Who of us thought at the time that the writing and the reading of "The Birds' Christmas Carol" was the beginning of a literary career which was to give happiness to thousands? Joy to be deep needs not to be noisy and influence to be blessed needs only to spring from purity and love.

AND ON EARTH—PEACE

He strolled to the window and peered out unhappily. Anne followed him. They stood there, looking, and Bertha, her heart beating now to a terrified measure, realized that she had only this little time to say whatever she might find to say. "Look," cried Carl, "there comes a car up the Glen Road!"

Bertha joined them and saw, down the valley, the brave little light of a car making its way in the storm. The light of Jane's house was now obscured in the surging of the snow. "Somebody must be as much in love as I am," said Anne.

BERTHA stared at them. How beautiful they were! How they loved each other! More than they knew! Was she so certain that they had chosen badly?

The question, stabbing at her, swung her round to face some inner clamor of which she had been aware from the first. How could she be so sure? Was any honest and intelligent person perfectly sure that the present order of education, of society, of family was the last word ever to be said? History was change. History had not stopped.

"Do you mind telling me," she asked uncertainly, "I mean, do you want to tell me what your plans are?"

"New York," said Carl. "The Greenwich Village section or some place where people understand."

"Understand," Bertha repeated. "Do you mean—know how you will be living?"

"Well, free people," said Carl with energy, "who know that being married isn't the only virtue. Generous, big-hearted people—not like these ghastly folks in our valley—but big souls who won't make a jolly row over things that are none of their business——"

"None of their business?" Bertha repeated. "Not if we aren't harming any one."

Bertha was feeling her way, wondering if she knew how to say the next word.

"What do you mean by harming any one?" she asked.

"Oh, just breaking their silly old laws for them," Carl explained.

"And history," Anne informed Bertha prettily, "is built on outgrown laws."

"Which somebody had to break before they could be outgrown," Carl added defiantly.

"What martyrs you are going to be—for the new society!" cried Bertha.

They looked at her a little stupidly. It was Anne who said with dignity:

"No. It's first of all because we love each other. We each want the other to be free."

"Then if," said Bertha clearly, "either of you finds somebody whom you love more—and who is equally free—then your duty to each other and society would be to separate and choose the new love."

"We shall always love each other," Anne began. Carl put in, "That's unthinkable." But they may suddenly have remembered that this was neither certain nor modern, and they looked at each other a bit foolishly.

Carl burst out: "Mrs. Millet—you're not going to pretend that you weren't glad when Bart went away?"

"In spite of everything, didn't—didn't my mother really do you—a service?" said Anne, very low. "From all that I know of him—why, she didn't even pretend to be sorry when they told her he had fallen from the cliff. She wasn't even sorry they didn't find his body——"

"She loved him once. And if I had loved him, they would have gone away together just the same," Bertha reminded her.

"No! Because then you could have kept him!" Anne cried, and stopped.

"Well, I didn't want to keep him," said Bertha distinctly. "The whole thing was a miserable failure. But it didn't occur to me that the way to make a success was by changing the law myself."

"Why not?" cried Carl.

"My dear Carl," said Mrs. Millet, "one person or two persons can not make a law for society—or change a law. One person or two person can merely break it."

"But a law is made—" Carl began.

"By majorities," she said. "Where is your majority?"

"All over the country!" cried Anne, "everywhere. You know how strong the feeling is——"

"In that case," said Bertha serenely, "get your majority together. Have them act together—as in any other lawmaking. Just now we are following a law made by one majority. Well, that's our law—until another majority changes it. Dodging it is no solution. That's like—like tax-dodging or bootlegging."

In her words there was something electric. Carl went again restlessly to the window. The storm was still driving, but now, where the Glen Road opened, the light which they had seen below was nearing the summit.

"It's somebody coming here!" he exclaimed.

Anne ran to look. Bertha said indifferently: "Nobody comes here."

But the light was the light of a car whose laboring ascent was now audible. And it panted into Bertha's little yard and halted, with a rasp of the brakes which was like a hoarse and relieved breath.

"Mrs. Millet," cried Carl, "it is somebody coming here. But please don't join in and argue against us—if they've come about us!"

IN THE flash of time before the stamping steps were heard on the walk there came to Bertha a triumphant sense of the essential honesty and openness of these two—to neither of whom did it seem to occur to try to evade the moment by hiding. She smiled at them, and went to open the door.

The figure making its way through the drift in the door-yard was small and agile, but it was so bundled that the door was closed before Bertha recognized her. The snow-laden shawls were thrown back, and there was Jane Graham. "Why Jane!" Bertha cried. "Jane—in all this storm——"

"Mother," Anne tried to say, "what a night for you to be out—" But the words died on her lips.

Mechanically taking off her wet cloak, Jane said not a word, nor did she speak when Carl brought her a chair by the fire. She sat there, breathing quickly, and seemed not to notice when Anne came and pinned back her wet hair. Bertha busied herself making fresh coffee, and otherwise the room was in silence. But when Bertha sat down by Jane, she started and drew back, looked at Bertha with a terrible intentness and said:

"So this is the way you've gone about it to pay me back."

"I don't understand," said Bertha gently.

"Are you going to pretend I haven't caught you red-handed making things easy for these two?"

"Mrs. Graham—" Carl burst out, but she cried:

"Nothing from you!"

"Mother," Anne tried to say, "she was doing her best——"

"And nothing from you!" cried her mother vehemently. "I know what I see. I found your note to-night that you thought I wouldn't see till morning. Carl's folks told me he'd come up here with supplies. I guessed the rest. You two keep still. It's with this woman I've got my settling to do."

When they broke into protest, Bertha said to them: "Please. I want to hear——"

Jane Graham turned and faced her.

"I should think you would want to hear," she said. "You only know what the village tells you. They tell you I went with Bart Millet because I was sorry for him—seeing you couldn't keep house for him nor cook nor make a home. Well, that wasn't it. I didn't like housekeeping any better than you did. But I loved him. I loved him from the first minute I set eyes on him. Anne was a little thing—I had her by the hand and I came face to face with him in the grove at the Sunday-school picnic. We stood and talked—he was taken by me just the same as I was by him. Anne let go my hand and ran away into the grove, and I never knew she was gone.

"From that minute I loved him. I saw what he was—selfish and complaining; but I didn't care. I knew he belonged to you, but I didn't care about that either. And so, when he came to the house one night and told Everybody is helped—everybody should help!

TUBERCULOSIS in this country is a threat against your health and that of your family. There are more than a million cases in this country today.

Stamp Out Tuberculosis with this Christmas Seal

The germs from a single case of tuberculosis can infect whole families. No one is immune. The only sure escape is to stamp out the dread disease entirely. It can be stamped out. The organized work of the tuberculosis crusade has already cut the tuberculosis death rate in half. This work is financed by the sale of Christmas Seals.

Everybody is helped by this great work—and everybody should help in it. Let every member of your family stamp all Christmas parcels, letters and greeting cards with these able little warriors against disease. Everybody, everywhere, buy Christmas Seals—and buy as many as you can.

Goiter, childhood's common ailment prevented by this new table salt—a more complete food

HOW simple a thing it is to save growing children from goiter which affects the health and beauty of so many. You merely substitute Morton's Iodized Salt for the table salt you are now using. It is a natural preventive of simple goiter. Yet it tastes and looks no different from our famous salt that "pours". Grocers carry both. The iodized variety however, contains a trace of iodine—included at the request of food authorities who have proved that it keeps the thyroid gland in the neck from enlarging. You owe it to your children to begin using Morton's Iodized Salt now. And by all means read our free book.

Mother Nature
~keeps children in the Pink of Condition

Mother Nature's demands are all too often dangerously ignored by children in their tireless zest for play.

But Mother Nature can help you keep the personal habits of your children regular and normal if you will only let her.

Mother Nature's help is to be found in NR Tablets—Nature's Remedy. NR Tablets are the all-vegetable laxative, containing Nature's own mild and pleasant correctives for sluggish and irregular elimination.

Let Nature's Remedy keep the children in the pink of condition by doing for them what they may neglect to do for themselves.

me he'd get a divorce from you if I wanted to wait, or he'd take me away with him right then if I wanted to go. I went with him.

"Well, for a while I was glad. Anne remembers that—she knows I was happy. I sang all day about my work—I was happy. And then——"

Bertha's level voice broke in upon hers.

"Tell me something, please," she said curiously. "Did you never think of me at all?"

Jane looked at her indifferently.

"I knew you wanted to get rid of him," she said. "He told me that."

"If I hadn't," Bertha persisted, "if I had loved him——"

Jane's eyes fell. "I loved him," she said, "and I was a fool."

"Mother," said Anne quietly, "if you loved each other, you would have been right. Love is the only thing in the world."

"And freedom," Bertha put in dryly.

"Yes, of course and freedom," Anne added hastily.

"'Freedom!'" cried Jane. "That's the kind of stuff you're teaching them——"

Carl sprang to his feet before her.

"Mrs. Graham," he cried, "she's teaching us nothing of the sort. She's been try——"

But he heard Bertha's voice saying evenly: "Carl, let's hear what Mrs. Graham has to say. I won't interrupt again."

"Mrs. Graham has this to say," said Jane, "that in two years' time I was sick to death of my bargain. He—he was all that you knew he was. Anne was ten—old enough to sense things. I had a little money from her father—I sent her off to school. For nine years Bart and I hated each other. Then the raft tipped him off and I was glad. It was his punishment. I always wondered what mine would be. When I read Anne's note to-night and heard that Carl had come up here, then I knew it was going to be through you."

"Mother!" cried Anne. "Mother——"

Carl bent over Mrs. Graham and spoke with a gentleness which lowered the high key of the room. "It isn't true," he said. "We'll tell you the whole truth——"

Jane Graham swept the young people aside and got to her feet and faced Bertha.

"You're right," said Jane, "this thing is between you and me. I'll tell you what I've come to say. It's this: I know you've got the right to hate me. But take it out some way on me. Don't hurt these children—don't hurt Anne! And it's this: If you'll help me keep things right for them, I won't say a word to anything you want to do to me—not one word. I'll give up the farm—I'll go off—I'll kill myself—but don't you teach them so's harm'll come their way."

"Jane," said Bertha, "why, Jane——"

BERTHA rose, trembling, stretched out her hand to the other woman, and neither of them heard the confused words of Anne and Carl trying to put their case.

But they all heard the voice outside which abruptly came cutting the storm and sounding within the room. And they heard the feet treading the snow of the porch.

"Bertha!" they heard. "Bertha!" And they all knew whose voice it was. They stared at one another as if it were the voice of the dead, given back by the river.

"It's Bart!" cried Jane terribly.

Bertha Millet was moving slowly toward the door, but Jane turned like a thing struggling in a net. She saw the threshold to the dark inner room and darted toward it. Then, as the voice echoed once more—"Bertha! Bertha!"—and a sharp knock sounded, Jane cried to Anne and Carl: "Let her see him alone!" The two, in an instinctive obedience, like that of little children in a crisis, went with her; and when Bertha quietly and with an odd way of smiling had thrown open the door, the room was empty as Bart Millet entered. He must have walked up the Glen Road, for he was caked white with the snow, and his face was white, too, like the snow that covered him. But his eyes burned, live and wild.

"Bertha!" he said, and stood staring at her.

"I don't understand," she said only.

He leaned against the closed door, breathing hard, like a man spent by more than running. He was gaunt, unshaven, but neatly dressed. With a manner of strangeness, as if he had come from a long distance or a long past, he said: "You thought I was dead, and I guess you didn't care."

"Every one thought you were dead," said Bertha. "Drowned, they said——"

"Drowned I would have been if I hadn't swum under water and got ashore downstream by the hut of a man I knew. It took him weeks to thaw the ice out of me—and when I found how things were thought to be—well, I let them think that way."

BERTHA looked at him thoughtfully, not so much weighing his words as noting a certain hunger in his eyes.

"Sit down, Bart," she said quite kindly.

He threw aside his coat and drew a chair to the fire, but he seemed aware of neither cold nor heat. When he saw that her look met his and did not turn from him, he cried:

"Bertha! Are you glad to see me?"

"What have I do to with you?" she asked.

"You were my wife," he said shortly.

"You're Jane's husband," she replied.

At that his head went down, but he said nothing. Only his great hand shot out and came to its rest on her knee. For a moment she did not draw away, but leaned forward, watching him intently.

"Bertha," he said, "I want you back."

At this she laughed lightly and, "Will you tell that to Jane?" she asked.

"To Jane—to everybody," he shouted, and then he caught the look in her face as she turned to the room. "Jane!" she called.

From that dark room Jane Graham walked out as if from a tomb of her own.

"Tell what to Jane?" she asked.

He sprang up, overturning his chair.

"All right," he said suddenly. "I tell you both. I was a fool to leave Bertha. I love her yet."

"And what made you leave her then?" cried Jane.

Before he could speak Bertha answered for him, for them all, quite gently.

"The same thing made him leave me," she said, "that made him leave you, and that brings him back here now."

Bart threw out his hands. "I wanted love," he said simply, and looked at neither woman, but stood staring at the fire. The raw truth brought them all to quiet. It was in quiet that Bertha spoke.

"I wanted love, too," she said.

And Jane said roughly:

"Didn't I want love? I was always one that wanted love as much as anybody."

In the heavy silence that settled upon the room, abruptly Jane began again to speak.

"I saw you with Bertha. I thought she didn't want you. I did want you. I figured it out that it wasn't right for you two to stay together if you didn't love each other."

"Wait!" Bertha's voice came doggedly. "I saw that you liked him. I wanted to be free of him. Time after time I threw you two together."

Bart Millet laughed.

"I saw you both maneuvering," he said, "Jane to get me and Bertha to get rid of me. I was mad because you didn't love me and glad you did. I wanted love—but I don't know whether I loved either of you, and I know now that neither of you loved me."

The eyes of these three turned back along the dark paths down which they had passed, alone or together, looking for love. And the three stood there empty. The silence continued and seemed about to snap when Bart Millet stirred and shifted. "I guess I'll go now," said he somewhat foolishly.

Neither woman spoke. He got into his coat, turned up its collar, nodded with stiff and almost ludicrous formality, and left.

Bertha whirled. "Oh, Anne!" she called, "Oh, Carl!"

Against the dark doorway Anne and Carl were like two spirits.

"It was most fearful eavesdropping—" Anne began, but Bertha cried:

"Promise each other—here and now—that no such ugliness as this shall ever touch either one of you. Promise!"

Carl stretched out his hand. "Why of course," he said proudly, "I can promise to love and cherish Anne all her life, so that nothing like this shall ever come near her."

"Oh, I can promise," said Anne gravely. "But you two poor——"

"Wait," said Bertha. "You two are promising to love each other all your lives!"

"Why yes, yes!" Anne cried. "Carl is not like that man—Carl and I——"

"Anne and I—" began Carl.

"That's all that marriage is," said Bertha. "Are you really afraid to say such things before your friends and the law?"

In the silence that fell Bertha's words came unforgettably: "Our failure did not come from being married too much," she said; "it came from not being married enough."

Jane Graham's voice came shrilly: "But I thought you were arguing them out of marriage, Bertha Millet!"

"Even if that had been true," said Bertha gently, "I couldn't have borne it to bring any more suffering on you."

At this Jane Graham covered her face with her hands. She did not weep—it was as if she remembered how no longer; but her hands upon her face were of sovereign eloquence—toil-worn, tired hands, that had made nothing of life and had from life but one gift: Anne.

Anne looked at Carl and their eyes spoke to each other. "Mrs. Millet," Anne said only, "if we're married on Christmas day, will you come down to the wedding?"

Bertha's eyes were on the window and, the storm having lessened a little, she could see again the light left burning in Jane's house.

"I'll come," she said.

Jane's harsh voice steadied them all.

"It's your own house," she said to Bertha, "and your own things. You'd better stay, and I'll go."

"Isn't there room enough in that house for both of us?" said Bertha. "Anyway, we can spend Christmas there, and then we'll see——"

The word Christmas hung in the air like a star.

MOON-ROSE

belong to. I had never thought of the king, but now that I have seen him, of course no one else will do quite as well."

She ran a finger along Possart's sleeve. She had never dared so familiar a thing before.

"You might have given me longer," she said. "Now I shall have to take the trouble of arranging some way to see him and——"

The carved door suddenly swung wide and the king stood in the open square of it—the stage cut out of the darkness behind in a panel of sharp white light, the singers going on, voices rising, falling.

"Tell them to stop that, Possart!" the king commanded in short, angry words. "I have heard the same music till it roars in my head! Do you think I want one opera over and over like a doll wound up for one trick?"

He came to the table and shut his hands on its carved edge. "Possart," he commanded, "I want an opera that is new—new! I will wait one day and one night!"

This was not the man who had smiled at Madlon. This was not even Possart's friend. This was his Majesty the king, lost in his maddest desire—his passion for music. Through the doors came the sound of the orchestra, the chorus going on—on. The king's eyes flashed.

"Possart!" he said. "Do you expect me to hear that over and over like a street organ! I want new opera, I tell you! New opera! Music no one has heard! I will wait but one day and night!"

Possart put his hands to his head—a motion of despair. Madlon stood against the wall. Her eyes never left the king's face.

"Your Majesty, but that is impossible," the impresario said. His voice seemed to whine. "There is no new opera! Where could it be found? Who could give it to me?"

"Nothing is impossible!" the king came back angrily. "To-morrow I want new opera and you are to get it!"

"But," Possart dared again to protest, "there is none!"

Madlon came a step out of the shadows.

"Please your Majesty," she said, "I can tell you where a new opera is hidden in Paris. I know where a master whose opera was refused is hiding, waiting to forget."

"You know this!" the king demanded, turning to her sharply. "Where, then?"

She held out her hands to him, her fingers curving softly.

"If your Majesty wants it so much," she said, "and I alone can tell where it is found—should there not be reward——"

"Name what you wish," Ludwig broke in impatiently. "Possart is commanded now to see that you have it." He addressed the impresario. "And hunt out this composer and opera at once!" he said shortly.

Possart touched his pointed beard with a thoughtful forefinger.

"But your Majesty," he began, "if the opera has been refused, should it be——"

"Refused by whom?" the king interrupted. "Who shall say what music may be beautiful to my ear! Possart, for those who do not see fit to comply with the king's command, there are more suitable places than Munich! Get me this opera within forty-eight hours!"

From beyond the doors came orchestra and voices going on, it seemed, endlessly.

"Keep that noise still!" his Majesty ordered. He moved his hands feverishly. "Call my carriage."

He straightened his shoulders and strode across the room to the outer door, directly past Madlon. Possart went with him, nervously trying both to precede and follow. With an impulsive little movement Madlon turned toward them, but Ludwig passed directly by. She watched him go down the scarlet hall, Possart after him. She felt again his hand over hers. King of Bavaria!

POSSART returned much disturbed. The puppets had played beyond him. "You've told a fine story," he said. "Refused opera of somebody hiding in Paris!"

Madlon smiled. Because she knew she had never interested Possart, it pleased her that she was able to disturb him now.

"Well, where is it?" he asked.

Madlon laughed. He was like a sulking boy.

"But of course the reward must be settled first," she suggested. "Didn't his Majesty say it was you who were to——"

"What in the name of Heaven do you want, then?" the impresario put in hotly.

Madlon sat back in a scarlet velvet chair.

"I do not ask much," she said, "in exchange for telling something for the king's pleasure! Only one week as a guest at the palace."

Possart rapped his fist on the table.

"You're out of your mind," he shouted at her. "Such a thing could not be heard of!"

Madlon pushed the velvet cushions idly.

"All right, then," she said; "but is it forty-eight hours the king gives you to get what he wants out of Paris?" She laughed. "Will you go up and down like a street-crier calling out for a composer of rejected opera?"

Possart looked at her with eyes like a wild animal's. He caught up her cloak, took his hat and stick and motioned her bluntly to precede down the hall. She looked at him

What about the nerves in your home?

You don't see the wires that run through the walls of your house, and bring electric light and heat and power to you at every place where you want them.

But these wires are as important to your house as your nerves are to you. Give them attention when you build. Rightly chosen, they will never go wrong.

When your architect specifies the G-E Wiring System, which conforms to advanced modern installation practice governed by safety codes, you have unseen wires that will never go wrong! Look for the G-E monogram.

MOON-ROSE

slyly as they passed out of the little door into the street again—warm, gray, sweet Summer night—lights blinking—sky veiled over with starlight. The carriage was waiting just where they had left it. Madlon took her cloak from Possart, laughing at his angry eyes.

"Gelbert," Possart told the coachman, "drive to the palace."

Madlon put that scarlet cloak around her and stepped into the carriage like a lady.

So the next day, through dingy poor streets of Paris, Possart went looking for what the king wanted. His cape swung against his legs handsomely. The women came up to him and walked beside him till he would rap his stick impatiently.

When he found the right street, it was night. Shutters and doors were closed, voices coming shrilly from behind them.

It was a painful business—seeking an opera that nothing was known about, to satisfy a demanding king. An opera no one ever had played or ever could play, probably.

Number twelve, she had said. He rapped at the gate. An old man in a night-cap opened a window up-stairs.

"What's wanted?" he inquired in French. Possart told him why he had come.

"Yes, all right," the old man said and took in his head and closed up the window.

But it was not the old night-cap who opened the door. It was the man Possart had come after. Broad shoulders, strong hands, a smock open at the throat, a loose cap of black velvet and gray eyes in a face so white that Possart thought at first the man was ill. He held a lamp as he opened the door.

"Will you come in?" he asked in German.

Possart went in, and there in that room—bare tables and chairs—he gave out the command of the King of Bavaria. The composer listened, sitting in the shadow.

"So you are to return with me to Munich," Possart said, "and read your rejected opera to King Ludwig. If he favors it—" Possart shrugged his shoulder—"if he favors it, you will have the whole world. The king is opera-mad. He is—mad," Possart said, lifting his eyebrows slightly.

The room was quiet for a minute. The lamp made a wavering light on Possart's satin collar, his satin hat. From above came an old voice droning prayers.

"When can you be ready?" Possart asked.

The composer rose.

"Unless old Lena is better of fever I will not go to the king at all," he said. He went past Possart up some narrow stairs and knocked on the stair wall.

"Lena," he called.

The rocking stopped. A door opened. Possart heard low-voiced French. Then the man Possart was after came down again, a cloak around him, a cloth case in his hand.

"All right," he said quietly. "I will go."

SEVENTEEN is young. It knows nothing but desire. They told Madlon when the king walked in his garden, so it was there she found him the morning after the affair with Possart—Madlon arrayed delicately in the pale-blue gown of Possart's particular friend among the court ladies.

"Good morning, your Majesty," she said. Her gown swept the grass. Her voice trembled a little. The king looked at her, annoyed. His flowers, like his opera, he wanted—alone. Then he remembered her.

"Oh, yes," he said. "Good morning."

He asked why she was there—if Possart had gone—then, with a sudden real interest, he asked how she had known of the lost opera and its composer.

She told him—yes, Possart had gone to Paris—she confessed that her presence in the palace was the reward she had asked—then she told about a drunk old Frenchman who had given away the story of a composer hiding in his house.

Down the wide garden paths they went together, between trellised flowers damp with fountain spray, fresh with June. Madlon said little. She had heard the king sought silence. Once, at sight of a butterfly poised on a flower, she caught his fingers—and after that they went on together like children, hand in hand. When she asked if she should leave him, the king told her to stay.

"I will give orders," he said, "that you are to stay as long at the palace as you wish. They shall call you the Little Baroness."

He asked if she wanted to help him plan an island of roses in the Lake of Starnberger. (The king had a castle on Starnberger Lake.) He asked if she wanted to see the stars that night through his great telescope. And when finally she left him and went back to the suite Possart had put her in, she was laughing at men—all of them—as she had never laughed before. So easy the game is!

She sat before the tall gold mirror and thought of soldiers in the bier keller—drunken voices—sour ale—hands that had touched her—men who had begged her for this and that. She wondered who would take around her father's mugs now. Never herself again—that was certain! She dared to wonder how long it would be before the king would say he loved her. Seventeen is young!

The servants talked about the king that day, and watched him and watched Madlon. The servants loved the king. No one but his servants had ever considered that he must be lonely. The noblemen thought of their own positions, their own dignity, railed at the king's passion for gentler things than blood and tyranny—but the servants loved him. Their babies toddled after him. He would stop at their homes and talk to them.

So now they watched him with Madlon and said to each other they hoped he might find love at last. They didn't know who she was—they didn't care. They only knew what the king did not know—that after all is said, life is made of only one thing. Music, gardens, castles, even kingdoms, are tallow candles burning—and gone. Love is the only thing change can never take from you.

That night Madlon dined alone with him. That night from his towers, as she watched the stars, the king watched her.

"Good night, Little Baroness," he said when he left her. "You shall stay here always. To-morrow we will plan the island of roses."

His fingers touched her hand a little.

She listened to the pleasant silk of her dress as she went down the long halls. She wondered if she should even see her red-faced father again. She began to feel she had been born to this. The king seemed—only some one. She looked at herself in the mirror and laughed! "Good night, Little Baroness. You shall stay here always."

The next morning in the palace gardens, where with his own hands Ludwig was chipping marble for a fountain, Madlon watching from the grass, the Vice-Chancellor Leichstadt came down the drive to where they were.

"Your Majesty," Leichstadt said, "Herr Possart has returned."

The king looked up quickly.

"Returned!" he exclaimed. "And the composer? The opera?"

"Your Majesty," Leichstadt told him, bowing slightly, "Possart and Richard Wagner wait your pleasure in the music-room."

SO THERE in that palace Wagner read his rejected opera to the king.

Ludwig listened like a boy—alert, eager. Wagner read with a slow rythmn, a love, an intensity in every word, every phrase. There was no sound but Wagner's voice, alternating with the melody his own fingers played. Madlon, watching the king's face, saw tears in his eyes. The king turned to Possart suddenly.

"In just one week," he said, "you will have ready a performance of this. A week from to-night I wish to hear opera such as your fiddle-strings have never played before!"

The king put his hand over Richard Wagner's hand.

"I feel the honor of your presence—deeply," he said. "You shall have a palace of your own. I will give you everything. You will be one of the great things of the world—and the key-note of my kingdom! You will inspire me to be a great king as you are a great master."

So came Richard Wagner to Bavaria. So became his music the mania of Bavaria's king.

Do we measure life by dreams?

From that time Richard Wagner became the center of the king's days. For hours Ludwig would sit while the master brought notes to life which have come on to you and me with tears.

Madlon, finding her hands suddenly as empty of the prize as they had been full of it, would watch for Ludwig, catch him, follow him, wheedle for his time—just an hour—but he was opera-mad. The world was nothing but Wagner's music!

As the days went on, she began to beat the fists of her temper against the walls. In the room with the gold mirror she began to tear into ruin the silk gowns that were brought her. For the one taste of conquest of that one little day she suffered thousands of hours. Possart came to her.

"Go home," he said. "Don't you know you are acting a little fool? The king doesn't even see you! You won't get what you want!"

Madlon put her face defiantly close to his.

"You don't know what I want," she said. "You only guess—and you are wrong!" Then she looked beyond him and smiled a little. "Possart," she said, "I have what I want—already! I could go home—but I won't!"

So Possart didn't know what she meant. He watched her closely as every day the king saw her less. Then he began to see that she was turning to a hatred of Wagner.

THAT was true. She was turning every hour into a desperate hatred of this one who dined with the king, walked and talked with him, filled his days and his nights. From her windows she could see him—his broad white face, his velvet cap—walking, talking with the king in that garden of trellised flowers. Hatred grew in her heart till her nails would cut into her hands—till tears would burn her eyes like acid.

Her hate began to make little marks on her beauty. First she was less serene. Then she laughed no more. Then she seemed no longer young. Then she planned how she could poison Wagner. The hour came back to her over and over of that night before Richard Wagner had come. The king's hand in hers!

"You shall stay here always!"

Then when she had the poison all ready, she told Possart, like a weak thing—and he dragged her to the priest. So in the quiet of that sanctum, tall candles, the hush of godly things, Madlon had to confess. She sat there with the father, and told of Wagner and the king. The father said Bavaria was being taxed heavily for the building of those dreams of the king.

"It is all Wagner!" Madlon cried fiercely. "He has put the king in a spell, I tell you! Wagner demands these things! He is robbing Bavaria of money and the king too—and paying with what? Nothing but music, music, music! But Wagner shall not be great! His music shall not live! I will keep him from it if I have to die myself with him!"

The father put his hand on her shoulder.

"My child, do not spend your hand in poison," he said. "Something else will happen soon!"

What little things make a world! Or is it that there are no little things? Is it that everything is big in the great plan? A country is only a gossiping village. How it loves something to talk about—some one to blame. How a tale grows from ear to ear. How words become real things, sharper and sharper.

The king! Richard Wagner!

Madlon talked. Then the priests talked. Then the people talked. And then one night in the streets of Munich Richard Wagner was taken out of Ludwig's carriage by a mob which even Ludwig himself could not withstand. Taken out of the carriage—out of Munich—and out of Bavaria in darkness and mystery. The king was like a firebrand. His eyes blazed. He sent out couriers—companies of soldiers. He commanded every force he had to find Wagner and bring him back.

But during all the past days when the king had been so unconscious of Madlon she had been very real to some one else. A tall, handsome prince relieved much of her loneliness and fretfulness with his flattery. This admirer was the general of the king's troops and so when the soldiers went out for Wagner they took themselves to the mountain roads outside of Munich (no farther), camped there, ate and drank and then rode back to tell the king they could find nothing.

AND this was Madlon! From a bier keller to this! A turmoil on its way to treason. a kingdom, a million people, the power of a king, the great city of Munich, industry peace, happiness hanging on a thread, because the king had said, "Good night, Little Baroness"—had touched her hand!

But how about one drop of blood on white linen? Madlon hadn't counted that she was staining, not alone Wagner, but the king himself.

On the streets the people began to whisper, "King Ludwig is mad!" A phrase began going around the court, "The mad King of Bavaria!" It got out into Europe! "Ludwig the mad king!"

It was Possart who brought it, at last, to Madlon. She turned on him like a tigress.

"Mad," she cried. "Ludwig mad! The people are mad! The soldiers should kill them in the streets for that!"

Possart laughed at her.

"What do you care what they say of the king?" he said. "He is nothing for you to want now! What would you say if I told you the heads of the court are removing him even to-day to the castle on Starnberger Lake—like a prison. He is mad, they say. Just a maniac with his dreams!"

Madlon caught at the marble posts behind her. She and Possart were on the side steps of the balcony around the palace. Leichstadt joined them.

"Possart," Leichstadt said, "the king has been told of his removal to the forest. Doctor Gueden is to attend him—is to remain with him constantly. There will be no retinue — no court. He will be quite alone."

Possart shrugged his shoulders.

"Well, Madlon," he said, "you've had your thumb on royalty. Now may I—" he bowed—"have the honor of returning you where you belong?"

The general, coming up behind them—dark, handsome, magnificent in full uniform—heard Possart. He put his hand beneath Madlon's elbow.

"Go nowhere, Little Baroness," he said, and looked straight into her eyes. "Life at the palace will be very gay when Ludwig is gone. Stay and share it with me. I will pay you such court that all the women will despise you in their envy!"

A shadow fell across the steps, and Madlon, looking instinctively to the doorway, saw the king standing there, his face gray, vague, expressionless—suffering eyes—heavy shadows beneath them—lips strained.

Those men, and Madlon, stood silent a minute, then suddenly she ran up the white steps to the king—only seventeen again—only young again and trembling.

"Your Majesty," she said brokenly, "let me go where you go! I love you!"

She dropped in a little heap of crumbled silk at his feet, her head against his knees.

"I love you," she whispered, "I love you!"

SO THE king and his household took up abode in that grim old castle on Lake Starnberger. Servants, Doctor Gueden, himself—that was all. But at the end of the white road that led from the castle to the lake, in a cottage which had been built once for the king's nurse, was Madlon.

"The castle of a mad king is no place for a girl," he had said. "But if it is true you want to come, you shall have the cottage."

The walls were plaster—white as white linen. There was a path, a gate, a tangle of flowers. From the door could be heard the lake brushing the sand.

One day Ludwig carried down Peter to live with her—the crippled five-year-old boy of a soldier who had been killed. Madlon would sit in the door in the sun and weave rugs and make lace. Peter would whittle things from wood and build sand houses, and they would count the hours till the king would come—always grave and quiet—always Doctor Gueden with him.

Madlon would tell him how fast Spring was coming. Another bud on the sassafras!

She never spoke of love—nor did he.

The general came down to her. Possart came down to her. The general told her how sparkling the court was—Possart told her how the soldiers in the bier keller clamored for her.

"You mope here, afraid to come back," Possart twitted. "Why don't you give in that once you didn't get what you wanted—and begin over!"

But Madlon would tuck her feet under her long black skirt, cuddle Peter's thin little body and smile.

"Possart," she would answer, "I have what I want. Can't you see I am happy?"

"But you haven't got the king," he would protest, "nor any honor at all!"

"I have what I want," she would tell him—and would say nothing more.

One afternoon to Madlon sewing linen—Peter with his crutch sitting against the door—came the king and Doctor Gueden with a long paper box between them. The king carried a spade.

"It is a wonderful rose," he told her. "The one really rare rose in the world! The flowers are white wax. They open only at night!"

His fingers caressed the heavy green leaves. His own hands dug the ground, put it in and banked the earth around. While he was pouring water slowly to seep around its roots, some one came down the path through the woods from the castle—one of the king's servants from Munich, one at whose little house the king had used to stop. The servant looked at Doctor Gueden, at Madlon. Then he turned to the king.

"I have found Richard Wagner for you," he said. "He is in Lucerne in Switzerland."

So couriers for the king began going between Lucerne and Munich. The king sent money, pleaded for Wagner to return, begged for music. Wagner would not come.

Ludwig, with hungry eyes, would tell Madlon and she would listen. He would prune the flowers. The moon rose grew dark and thick. Doctor Gueden would sit always by them, while the king dug in the dirt, or swept the door-step, or sang little songs for Peter.

"And because flowers and music are more to me than blood and tyranny," he said to Madlon once, looking up at her suddenly, "they call me mad!"

And so again he began to think of nothing but Wagner's music. More of it! He tried to escape from the castle and go to Lucerne.

Summer came—and then, one day, a despairing letter from Wagner, answering at last the king's demand for music—returning money the king had sent. He wrote:

> I am through. My writing is done. My life is over. Since I have known that there are plots against my life by priests and people who say I am teaching too much—putting life too plainly—using your money that might be for other things, I find myself considering what death is, and so doing I find that it means but one thing to me—separation from my music. I find I am afraid in life or death of but one thing—my soul and my music being lost to each other! So I will not write again.

There was a space in the letter, then it went on:

> Ludwig, it is with the greatest anguish I have ever put into words I tell you, not only that I will not write again, but that I can not. To you alone I tell my suffering. The music is gone! Fear comes in like blackness flooding over white—fear that through eternity I must leave my tenderest passions behind me. If in some way I could know that my own soul might move on through the years, still one with the soul of my music, then I could write. But until there is an answer to my doubt, an answer that is living proof, I can write no more.

Ludwig read that letter to Madlon by the shore of the lake one night at dusk. They sat on a pile of driftwood there, Doctor Gueden on an upturned boat.

"But Wagner is wrong," the king said. "Madlon, when we die, do you know what our heaven is? I think it is our coming back to be forever with the thing we have loved the most. I want to prove that to him beyond a doubt! The language of music is the language of courage and love! Music carries the weary soldiers through! Music brings about forgiveness and tenderness. It is the language men need, and Wagner can speak in that language. What do we buy with our lives? We trade in days like pieces of money, and what do we get? What fool puts money down and says, 'There, let it go!' But how do we spend days—of which we have so few and can get no more! Wagner's days are a profit. I am only a mad king who has given little—can leave nothing. The master Wagner can leave music that will be a pride to Bavaria a thousand years after I am dust! If he has lost his inspiration in fear of eternity, and if I, by only dying, can prove to him I still live on with what I love, so as to remove his doubt and let his work go on—then I too would have spent my life for a purpose!"

His eyes looked out where blue mist crept up from the lake.

"I have sent a letter to Wagner," he went on, "telling him I will free his mind of fear. I have told him that when I die, if I still may be part of what I love, I shall somehow cause to grow in his garden in Lucerne a moon rose, as an answer to his question."

Doctor Gueden was watching the king sharply—Madlon listening with a strange fear. After a minute, Ludwig turned to her, brushed her hair back from her forehead, and looked into her eyes.

"You are cold," he said.

He took his long blue cape from his own shoulders and wrapped it around her.

"I will take you home," he said.

They went along the gray shore together. At the door of the cottage he smiled at Peter on the floor asleep. He picked him up, put him on the bed and wrapped something about him. When he turned to Madlon again, he looked at her searchingly, then, as gently as he had lifted Peter, he drew her against him—into his arms.

"Little Baroness," he said, "I would give all I have if I could love you. You would be the flowers I want to tend. You would be the music that goes on in my brain like a ceaseless waterfall. You would be pure white lace in a perfect design. When I heard them say I was mad—do you know why I did not dispute them? Because, dear one, I thought of you—and knew they were right. For only a mad brain can not love, and I knew if I were not mad I would love you. But once—you said you loved—me. If that is true—will you kiss me?"

Her hands were fever hot in his, her eyes wet with tears. There in his arms she drew him down to her and kissed his lips—the lips she adored. When he released her, she saw him looking beyond her.

"Yes," he said quietly, "I am coming."

Doctor Gueden was standing in the doorway.

He left the blue cloak around her shoulders.

"Mad—mad as a loon," the doctor mumbled as Ludwig passed him and went on ahead.

Madlon watched the king in the dusk, up the white road. By the door of the cottage the waxen petals of the first moon rose were beginning to unfold.

IN THE night—midnight, perhaps—Peter wakened her catching at her arms.

"I'm afraid," he whimpered. "It's so dark!"

She half wakened to hush him—then suddenly sat up and caught his head against her heart. "Peter, what is it?" she whispered. "What is it?"

She heard men along the shore—the splash of oars. She saw the flash of torches over the water, and beyond her open door, up in the castle, lights in a hundred windows.

She held Peter, hot and shivering. The men on the shore were shouting now.

Then some one came running through the trees. She heard Possart call her name.

"Madlon," he called. "Madlon!"

She got out of bed and ran to her door. Possart was bare-headed—his face white against the darkness.

"The king is dead, Madlon!" he said hoarsely. "They have found him in the lake! Here is something—a letter he left for you!"

Madlon, with Peter in her arms, slid down against the frame of her open door.

Possart sat by her all the next day. All day the dull gong-gong of monastery bells sounded across the water. Her face was very pale, her hands limp and cold. Peter clung to her fingers, trying to warm them. Possart was determined to take her away. "You didn't get what you wanted. Come back now!" he insisted.

"Possart, I have what I wanted," she said, tears caught in her lashes. "I wanted to learn to give without seeking—and I can do that now."

POSSART never saw Madlon but twice again. Once he went through the snow to that little house in the barren Winter. He found four little children eating bread and milk on her floor, her fingers flying over thread lace to sell for money.

"Well," he said, "I have been to Switzerland! I have seen your enemy—the man you hate! It is true he can write no more! It is true his genius is strangled with fear of an eternity and his music left behind! He waits for Spring and that moon rose till I think he is as mad as the king! But now you can be satisfied. Now you have your wish. Richard Wagner will be great no longer!"

"But Ludwig died," she said, "that Wagner's music might go on!"

Possart looked out at the white cold hills.

"Yes," he nodded. "Poor mad brain to promise proof of life after death by a rose growing in Switzerland!"

He turned to her suddenly—commandingly. "And you are coming back to Munich," he said. "I am here to take you!"

She smiled down at those tumbling babies.

"And leave these?" she asked. "For what?"

Little hands caught her skirts. Little pale faces crept against her knees.

In the Summer once again Possart came to that cottage. He came hurrying to her open door and called her.

"Listen!" he said excitedly. "That moon rose! It is growing in Switzerland! And Wagner has found it! He is writing day and night! He is writing like a man possessed!"

Possart looked nervously at the sunshine streaking across her flowers, their stems and petals moving as though some one might be there among them. He shivered.

"It almost makes me feel as though the king were still here at your door," he said.

"Well," Madlon smiled, "why not?"

Do we measure eternity by hope?

I STAYED that night at the inn in the nearest village.

"It's an odd old lady up along by the castle," I said to the innkeeper at breakfast. A tender smile came on his face.

"The Little Baroness?" he questioned. "God keep her! Always taking in little waifs that hasn't nobody! Mostly lame ones—but any ones and all ones! Never been out of sight of the shore but once! Once my father went with her some place in Switzerland to set out a rose slip. Set it out awful queer in the dead of night, but I don't think she's been away from here one day since! She keeps a little tavern there for folks that meet with trouble! Don't never seem to get tired, nor old, nor out of patience like the rest of us! Going there seems like going to a saint!"

I thought of that ivory letter:

"LITTLE BARONESS—Your love alone has given me peace to bear the suffering of these last days of my life. You were to me like one of God's angels, in that sublimeness of giving, not seeking. And so it is to your flowers, your cottage, your dreams, your heart, I shall come back to find my heaven, praying only to be with you always, as through these last sweet days, in humble adoration.

Your servant, THE KING."

Do we measure strength by sorrow?

adjustment. A sense of being trapped angered and frightened her, and she made up her mind that they would return early on the following day, and that henceforth the friendship between herself and these men should suffer a sudden cooling.

Bump—bump—bump. The roads were full of deep holes. Janey began to hope that they would break a spring in one of these mud-pits and have to go back to Palermo.

ONCE free of the villages, the way was much easier. Miles and miles and miles. Sometimes they passed villas, plunged deep in bloom. Often they ran beside the sea, often left it, and threaded orchards, orchards, orchards again, with starved narrow strips of vineyard rising where the mountains began. Acres of prickly pears filled one field after another; di Rampolli descended and picked some for both cars, running to and fro between his guests, good natured and boyish in the warm sun, peeling the spiny fruits skilfully, offering them on slim twigs and delighted with the pleasure he gave.

"How far have we come, prince?" Janey asked, when, somewhat won from her dark mood, he had resumed his seat beside her again, and the jolting and shaking had commenced.

"Half-way. But you're tired?" Fraternelli said quickly.

"No, not a bit. Are you, Aunt Nell?"

Mrs. Stanley, resting comfortably against the cushions, was sound asleep. Di Rampolli sat between Janey and her aunt, Fraternelli on the front seat, but so turned about that he could talk with them easily.

"We'll have lunch at Tomasio's, Carlos? We're later than I thought. Did you notify Tomasio or Umberto or Enrico to be ready for us along the road?"

"I notified—" the prince said good naturedly, "them all."

"But all three will have a feast ready," Fraternelli said amusedly, with an appreciative glance for Janey.

"Then two may call in the neighbors," the young noble said negligently, and they all laughed.

At noon they stopped at a roadside inn, where a few tables covered with coarse white cloths were set forth under a grape-vine. The girls were stiff, weary, starving and in high spirits. They made what improvements they might in their appearance, in a bare up-stairs room, and descended to find everything charming, and the good smell of cooking food especially welcome.

"They say about ten minutes, signorina. We are a trifle late; they had thought we were not coming," said Fraternelli, as they found places, and began to trifle with the iron-handled knives and forks.

"And he said something about bandits—I distinctly heard, the word 'banditti'!" Mrs. Stanley, who had preceded the younger women down-stairs, said with an air of resuming an abandoned topic.

Fraternelli laughed.

"True, I asked him if there had been any talk of bandits lately," he admitted, "and you saw him laugh. 'Bandits. Why, your excellency, how should we have anything like that in these peaceful hills?' he asked."

"Ah, don't discourage us," Janey pleaded gaily. Danger of any sort seemed remote. The sun shone, the dark eager children of the inn scuttled and peeped like the curious goats from near-by points of vantage.

The luncheon came, and di Rampolli's guests ate shamelessly until they could eat no more.

JANEY began to enjoy the adventure heartily.

When they resumed their places in the cars, she had persuaded Mrs. Stanley, Lebretagne and Fraternelli to join Vivienne in the second, while she and Dolly had the two younger Italians in the pathfinding car. Dolly brightened visibly at this arrangement, and at half-past one o'clock the caravan was upon its way again, winding on and on into the heart of the hills.

"We lose the sea!" Janey mourned, when the sun was at their backs, and the road rising.

"Ah, but we find it again, signorina."

"And are we nearly there, prince?"

"To Tramontare? Oh, no, not yet, signorina. We are—" He changed from French, and spoke quickly in Italian to the other man who was driving. "We are about half-way," he announced, in the former tongue.

"About half-way! Why—but it's nearly three o'clock. And Count Fraternelli said that we were half-way long ago—before luncheon," Janey exclaimed. Count Rossi smiled vaguely, di Rampolli lifted eloquent eyebrows and shoulders.

Janey was growing tired, and eight hours in the car had had a wearying effect upon her thoughts as well. At one moment she and the Saterlees and her aunt were simply casual American visitors to Sicily, being taken most hospitably upon an interesting trip into the less-known and less-populated parts of the island. Their hosts were noblemen, well known by all the city, men with reputation and standing to risk.

More than that, Jane Richie Davenport was not an entirely unimportant person in her own country, and there were on her own private yacht, which should reanchor in Palermo harbor in a few days' time, one old man and two young ones who were her protectors, her champions, who would make short work of any mystery or difficulty in connection with her disappearance.

These thoughts would calm her for a while. Then the increasing wildness of the scenery, the menace of the long lonely stretches, when the cars labored like awkward beetles past rocky rises, pressed upon her heart with the first real fear. She began to catch at scraps of comfort.

"There's a church, anyway, Dolly!" she exclaimed.

"Yes, and there's one of those lovely donkey-carts!"

The group was silent from sheer fatigue as the cars panted up a grade and paused upon the rocky, forbidding summit. Here they all got out, to walk stiffly up and down, yawning, shuddering a little with muscle-soreness.

Behind them the day was dying, the mountains fumed like great caldrons. From the sun, caught like some furious monster in the trap of mountains, came angry shafts of dazzling red. The sight was almost terrifying, and Janey felt her heart sink.

She wished they had never come upon this expedition—too late for that now! But unless she really intended to marry Carlos di Rampolli, this was surely a very pronounced sign of interest in him on her part and might easily be misinterpreted by him, and by Fraternelli, and by any one else to whose interest it was to misinterpret it.

AND why not marry him, if he wanted her to? Truly, he wouldn't be one's ideal of companionship and intelligence in a husband; he was merely a nice boy, silent, unresponsive. If she married him, an enormous proportion of her property would have to be transferred to him; that was the law. Women didn't rank as citizens in his country, nor sign checks, nor enter into contracts.

"Carlos wouldn't be very thrilling as a husband," she mused on, as an especially bad mud-hole threw her violently against him, and she and Dolly straightened themselves with much laughter. "But there might be nice children—we could keep the yacht——"

The only possible flaw in the picture was Carlos. He was a full five years her junior in actual time, he was hopelessly and fundamentally her opposite in every way. Not when he was forty, or seventy, would he speak her language truly, or on any subject feel any sympathy, or indeed comprehension, for the viewpoint of an American woman.

To say to Carlos that a woman might possibly be his superior in a mental way would have been like saying to him that his horse had the better mind. He would smilingly agree—it didn't matter what a woman thought, let her think herself his better if she liked. The fact would remain that she was not; that she was physically his inferior, a creature of limitations, of tears, hysterics, moods, unhappy when she was dragging herself about before a child's birth, and hence to be humored at that time, childishly complacent and content when the baby was in her arms, and ready once more to be the attentive wife.

She would be jealous of his love-affairs; what of it? She had no appeal. She would fret over his money extravagances; no matter. She would scold, protest, exact promises, and he would sip his wine, and speak to her soothingly, and go upon his uninterrupted way. After all, had she not a coronet upon her card, were not her children noble? And these things might not be without him.

Janey saw all this clearly and raged within. But if she didn't take him, some other girl would. Some other girl would be the Princess di Rampolli, coming back to America to visit and hearing "Your Highness" on all sides!

A SUDDEN interruption to the trip interrupted her thoughts likewise. The following car had halted with a broken spring, and its occupants were agitatedly grouped about it when the leaders went back, discussing the seriousness of the delay. A strong wind had sprung up, leaves whirled, blossoms were blown down.

Although the tones of the driver's jabbered words were reassuring, Janey could see, from one glance at Fraternelli, that this was a most unwelcome interruption to the journey.

"Of course we are nearly there now! The car must be fixed; we couldn't go back with this spring," he said cheerfully, visibly pulling himself to the required attitude. "But can we make the rest of the way with it? Can't,

Something NEW for BOBBED HAIR

There is a tremendous difference in bobs. Some are wonderfully attractive and becoming, while others, well—which kind is yours?

I wish you could picture the becoming kind I have in mind—the sort that makes men turn to admire. I can't tell you what the color is, but it's full of those tiny dancing lights that somehow suggest auburn, yet which are really no more actual color than sunlight is. It's only when the head is moved that you catch the auburn suggestion—the fleeting glint of gold.

You have no idea how much your bob can be improved with the "tiny tint" Golden Glint Shampoo will give it. If you want a bob like that I have in mind, buy a package and see for yourself. At all drug stores, or send 25c direct to J. W. KOBI CO., 670 Rainier Ave., Seattle, Wn.

A Sure Way to End Dandruff

There is one sure way that never fails to remove dandruff completely, and that is to dissolve it. Then you destroy it entirely. To do this, just apply a little Liquid Arvon at night before retiring; use enough to moisten the scalp and rub it in gently with the finger tips.

By morning, most if not all, of your dandruff will be gone, and two or three more applications will completely dissolve and entirely destroy every single sign and trace of it, no matter how much dandruff you may have.

You will find, too, that all itching of the scalp will stop instantly, and your hair will be lustrous, glossy, silky and soft, and look and feel a hundred times better.

You can get Liquid Arvon at any drug store and a four ounce bottle is all you will need. This simple remedy has never been known to fail.

eh?" he echoed disappointedly, as both drivers burst into vociferous protests.

"Oh, dear, let's go back to Palermo—let's get back somehow to-night—I'm scared to death of robbers—we haven't a gun or anything among us!" Vivienne Saterlee wailed.

"Oh, Vivienne, I feel as you do—do let's for heaven's sakes go back!" Mrs. Stanley seconded it almost hysterically. "Where on earth are we? It'll be dark in fifteen minutes——"

"And there will be a splendid moon in half an hour!" Fraternelli reminded them, with a gallant air of amusement at their fears. "We reach di Rampolli boundaries in another hour——"

"Another hour!" wailed all the women together, between laughter and tears.

Fraternelli, instead of confirming it, fell into rapid undertones with the young Italians.

"No, we must go on," he said in English, suddenly terminating the other discussion. "We'll all have to get into this car and leave the other to its fate. If you, signora——"

"Leave the driver," Janey interrupted, "and we'll send back for him with a tow and some supper. Otherwise the car might be stolen."

"An excellent idea, signorina!" Fraternelli said enthusiastically. But when they were all carefully packed into the single car she was bewildered to note that both drivers were accompanying them.

Her first impulse was to call this to Fraternelli's attention. But upon second thought she checked herself and was silent. If he didn't care about the car, why need she? Her face grew red with resentment in the dark.

"To-morrow night!" she prayed. "To-morrow night we'll be safe back at the Villa Igiea, and the orchestra will be playing dance music! Or if not to-morrow," she had in common reason to correct herself, remembering the broken spring, "then positively the day after! And something tells me—something tells me that the Dixie Belle will be made ready for a long sea trip a few days after that!"

Vivienne, whose weight was less than a hundred pounds, was in her lap, her shoulder-blades bumping against Janey's face. Dolly, in the opposite corner of the tonneau, occupied the more ample lap of Mrs. Stanley. Between the four women Count Rossi was squeezed. On the small seats Lebretagne and Fraternelli were tightly wedged, and buried in luggage on the front seat di Rampolli sat next to one of the drivers and peered above suit-cases to direct him on his way. The other driver, gripping bags with his knees, rode standing on the running-board, bending close above the women when low branches swept above the car, or when the ascent grew precipitous and every ounce of weight was needed to keep the wheels in the road.

ALL available rugs and plaids had been utilized to keep the passengers in the back seat comfortable. Presently the moon rose in a troubled wild sky of black galleons, and the travelers could get turning views of the sharp black crests of the mountains, the sea, the slopes of vineyards, rocky fields and desolate scrubby growth.

Fraternelli was deep in an amusing description of a misunderstanding with the opera company that had last Spring come to Palermo. But the women, buried under each other's weight, could not listen. When for a kilometer or two the road was a mere crooked shelf above the black jaws of a valley far below, Mrs. Stanley kept crying out:

"Oh, my God—Janey, ask him if it's safe: Count Fraternelli, I'd much rather walk for a while—truly I would—oh, don't bounce, Dolly, or we'll all—oh, my God!"

"The idea: So you couldn't have any performances at all," Vivienne said politely, yet in a shaking tone, to the story-teller.

"Ah, no, we had to have twenty, instead of five—that was the very point, signorina," Count Fraternelli replied, with great spirit.

"The idea—oh, have we much more of this," Dolly began in a purely conversational tone of interest, and ended with a scream.

"No, no more. We are out of the mountains now. We have nothing but down-hill roads now and he can go a little faster," Fraternelli answered reassuringly, interrupting his narrative with perfect ease.

"Janey, we were very silly to do this," her aunt murmured, under cover of a conversation that suddenly commenced in low tones among the hosts.

"Oh, I know it, Aunt Nell! But they're just as much distressed as we are," Janey reminded her, in a very low tone.

"More, believe me," Fraternelli said, smoothly entering the conversation. "But we are saving our apologies until we have you comfortable—which will be a few minutes now. We did not tell you, because it was not necessary to distress you, that the drivers lost their way to-day, and went almost ten kilometers on the wrong road. The opera committee, not satisfied with having fifteen operas as at present—" Fraternelli was resuming with relish, "requested that we turn in our resignations. I had the great satisfaction of reminding them——"

"Oh, really, if it's up-hill again you must let me walk! I can't stand those curves! I assure you, count—you tell him, Janey, that last year I had a complete nervous breakdown——"

Janey, resting her weary, dirty face against Vivienne's coat, wondered what would happen if this trip actually killed Aunt Nell. Aunt Nell was sixty-two, after all. What time was it, anyway?

"Is it about seven o'clock, count?"

"Yes, signorina—I am so sorry! If we had dreamed, we might have brought some chicken sandwiches from the hotel!"

Sandwiches! To Janey's ears they sounded unbelievably civilized. Had she ever been anywhere where slim, cool chicken sandwiches, each with a pale-green slice of pickle, might be had for the asking? Had she ever sat in the warm darkness of the Metropolitan, listening to Farrar in "Carmen"? Or had she been wedged all her life long, cold, hungry, exhausted, in this bumpy car, with Viv Saterlee on her lap?

"We'll enjoy our rest to-night," Dolly said gallantly.

"Eventually," Janey agreed. "Aunt Nell——"

"Yes, dearie?"

"Are you all right?"

"I don't feel very well," Mrs. Stanley admitted, after a pause. "What's that, Count Fraternelli? Not rain?"

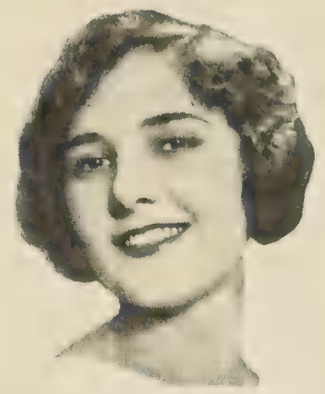
"Stay where you are. I think we had better get this top up over these ladies," the count said without comment.

A WILD sudden rain-storm was upon them, black, cold tongues of water bit and splashed at them like flames, trees creaked in the darkness. They had crossed the island now, and could hear the hoarse voice of the sea below them, upon rocks.

"Drive slowly." Fraternelli shouted to the driver.

It was simply grim endurance now for them all, there was no laughter, no mere courage of words.

"The gates," Fraternelli announced, after an eternity of black bumping and rocking and jolting. And still they went on and on and on——



"Ah-h-h! Here we are!" He was the only one with the energy left to say it. The women were silent as they stumbled, stiff and drooping, into the disks of light thrown by the headlights of the car. All about them a black world ran with inky water.

Janey supported her aunt without speaking. No use to protest, to beg her not to collapse. Gradually the enormous bulk of a castle raised itself above them, black against deeper blackness. Far down its cliff-like side a dull red light shimmered.

Blindly, like cripples, they started toward the light. A door was opened, there was dim pink color inside, forms silhouetted against it. A great stone-floored room and a primitive brazier; servants running forward.

They had had no message. They had seen no messenger. The terrible truth smote through Janey's paralyzed senses, and she

Those white lovely teeth

Are they safe?

LOVELY, white teeth are safe from loss only if the gums are kept firm and healthy. If pyorrhea attacks your gums, an X-Ray would reveal how quickly the infection spreads to the root sockets which support the teeth. Your teeth fall out or must be pulled—unless pyorrhea is checked.

This X-Ray shows tooth socket destruction by pyorrhea

Tender, bleeding gums and sensitive teeth warn you of pyorrhea's attack

DENTAL clinics since 1908 have proved that Pyorrhocide Powder is a most effective dentifrice for helping to check, as well as prevent pyorrhea. Its tonic and stimulating qualities aid in correcting bleeding gums, strengthening tender gums, hardening soft gums. As a corrective of sensitive teeth it is unequalled.

It keeps the teeth white and clean. It is medicated with Dentinol, a gum-tissue healing agent used by dentists in the treatment of pyorrhea.

Use Pyorrhocide Powder daily—see your dentist regularly—and you can avoid pyorrhea. The economical dollar package contains six months' supply. At all druggists. Send for free sample and booklet on causes and prevention of pyorrhea.

Comb Sage Tea in hair to darken it

Common garden sage brewed into a heavy tea with sulphur added, will turn gray, streaked and faded hair beautifully dark and luxuriant. Just a few applications will prove a revelation if your hair is fading, streaked or gray. Mixing the Sage Tea and Sulphur recipe at home, though, is troublesome. An easier way is to get Wyeth's Sage and Sulphur Compound, the ready to use preparation improved by the addition of other ingredients. A bottle costs only 75 cents at any drug store.

While wispy, gray, faded hair is not sinful, we all desire to retain our youthful appearance and attractiveness. By darkening your hair with Wyeth's Sage and Sulphur Compound, no one can tell, because it does it so naturally, so evenly. You just dampen a sponge or soft brush with it and draw this through your hair, taking one small strand at a time; by morning all gray hairs have disappeared, and, after another application or two, your hair becomes beautifully dark, glossy, soft and luxuriant.

felt that but for her fears for Aunt Nell she would drop where she stood. Di Rampolli and Fraternelli were evidently abusing these poor folk. It didn't matter.

"Come up-stairs—" the older man was invincible, his tone was buoyant still. "Come up-stairs and let us make you comfortable, and they will bring us something to eat as fast as they can."

Comfortable! Cruel, cold wet winds found the great stone staircase, and buffeted them as they mounted it. There was no sign of warmth or coziness anywhere. "The Grand Central Station has nothing on this," said poor Janey with chattering teeth. "Hadn't we better stay down there? At least they have a fire."

"Five minutes, signorina—" Fraternelli begged. Some of the men from down-stairs had accompanied them to the great chilly drawing-room; there were rugs here, and chairs. A candle was lighted.

Janey, her teeth rattling, got her aunt upon a cold sofa, piled damp coats on her.

"Here," Dolly Saterlee said, moving about desperately, "let's get a fire going."

"I beg you—you must permit the servants to do that, signorina," Count Rossi said quickly in Italian. Janey swept him one contemptuous glance, was upon her knees at the great fireplace, had lighted a crumpled mass of twigs and paper with a match from her own little silver match-box, and was coaxing it to burn.

"They will do it as fast as they can—you are distressing Carlos," Fraternelli said in her ear. "Well, let us all help," he conceded, "let us all be good Americans."

"Americans would have the place hot by this time," Dolly murmured, on the other side. "Count Fraternelli, we want wood here. Is there a chair or something we could burn?"

"If you will just give the men time—" Fraternelli pleaded. "No, truly, you must sit down and let them manage it. They lose their respect for those who wait on themselves," he explained in an undertone.

JANEY wasted no words upon him. As the reluctant blaze strengthened and mounted, she glanced about the enormous room in despair. They would never be warm here! Perhaps, if they lived, they would get back to Palermo to-morrow. But there was small chance of any rest to-night.

Wild, frowsy servants came and went. Wood was thrown noisily down by the hearth. Janey persuaded a savage-looking, smiling woman to bring up a pot of hot water. She filled her aunt's hot-water bag, and bathed the weary face.

"Ah-h-h, that's good. Ah, that's wonderful," Mrs. Stanley finally stuttered, from under her rugs and coats.

"It is so unfortunate—it is so extremely unfortunate—" di Rampolli kept repeating agitatedly. But Janey noted that he made no move himself to better the situation, unless imperative orders to the running servants might be so considered. Evidently noble blood could not sink to that.

Presently there was soup and coffee, bread, butter and an omelet. The girls were almost too tired to eat. Violent shudders of fatigue shook them.

"Prince di Rampolli, I don't dare move my aunt to-night," Janey presently said definitely. "Ask these people to bring some blankets down. We'll sleep here, and keep up the fire all night."

"I wouldn't move for a king," Viv murmured.

"But we couldn't permit that sort of hospitality," Fraternelli protested. "They are arranging the bedrooms now."

"Are there fires in them?" Janey asked wearily.

"No, but you will find this sort of cold weather most unusual, signorina. To-morrow it will be hot and clear again—the rain has already stopped."

Janey leaned back in her chair with shut eyes. She felt beaten, body and soul.

"I'll go up and look," she announced, with a sudden inspiration. "Dolly, come with me. Viv—you stay here until we come back."

They had supposed the big room hardly affected by the fire, but the halls were like tombs. Drafts blew past them when they opened the doors of the enormous, icy bedrooms where the maids were struggling with mammoth beds.

Five minutes later they returned triumphantly to the drawing-room, loaded with blankets and pillows, and followed by puzzled women similarly loaded. Di Rampolli was instantly upon his feet, and Fraternelli seemed genuinely shocked—shocked out of his usual graciousness.

"But, signorina, we couldn't permit this! You see how utterly horrified the women are at the mere idea. Let us give orders that some of the rooms with fireplaces be aired——"

"We're all dead," Janey said, yawning unashamed. "Gentlemen, we'll excuse you all. Please don't argue about it. Please—please get out. I wouldn't move my aunt up to one of those cold bedrooms to-night for anything in the world."

She took a great bundle of bedding from one of the women, tumbling against it for sheer weariness as she did so. The men watched her disapprovingly, from the little group into which they had gathered.

"We're none of us fit for any further discussion," Janey added ungraciously. "Good night!"

"Good night!" Vivienne Saterlee said, with a faint accent upon the last word that sent all three girls into exhausted and painful hysterics of laughter when, with a maid or two, they were alone.

"Girls don't fall dead until we do just a few things," Janey pleaded then. "Don't let's get laughing, or we'll break. Help me wheel this couch nearer the fire and get Aunt Nell's shoes off. Don't take that pot of coffee away, Rita—Nina—whatever your name is—we may need it in the night. Can you say anything like that in Italian, Dolly? She looks as if I had pointed a gun at her."

"She's in a cold sweat because we're touching these blankets with our sacred hands," Vivienne observed. And again, weary, aching, cold as they were, they shook with helpless laughter.

Another couch and a wide chair were pushed toward the hearth, and the girls removed their wet outer things.

Mrs. Stanley's clothes were drawn off, her warm wrapper substituted, and Janey insisted upon administering a white pill from her beautiful little fitted case—"to break up a cold." Presently the light was out, they were all under blankets, and only the firelight was playing in the great shabby room.

"I'll bet they're mad as hornets at us," Dolly murmured, in the delicious process of growing warm and sleepy at one and the same time.

"We should worry," Janey returned, wishing she were up to give the fire one more log.

"Have we enough wood for the night?—don't use slang, Janey dear." This was from her aunt.

"If we haven't we'll stick a couple of tables in," Janey stated, and Dolly, who shared her couch, shook it with a desperate laugh.

JANEY said nothing more. If her face had been visible, the other might have seen the stern, the tragic look that darkened it, seen the bitten lower lip, and the narrowed eyes. But there was no light in the room at all now except the drowsy pink glow of the fire, and within a few moments three of the four wearied women were asleep, the girls deeply, relaxedly, Mrs. Stanley with an occasional restless twist of her aching body and an occasional hoarse cough.

But Janey lay wakeful, reviewing the march of the day's events, thinking back over the happenings of the last ten days, anticipating the morning.

Within a few months, perhaps, if she so chose, she might be mistress of this old castle. The young prince was looking for a rich wife, and she was rich enough to satisfy him. He liked her too, found her—as all men had found her—pretty and young and attractive and likable; it would be a sufficiently suitable match, even without the money. But, of course, the money was the main consideration.

"Never!" Janey said out loud in the darkness. Vivienne stirred, moaned in her sleep. Reality returned. They were on a house-party in the Sicilian mountains; they were all trying to sleep in the big drawing-room. "I am growing up," thought Janey solemnly. "I feel older to-night than I ever have felt in my life before!"

She had learned something in Sicily. She would never be dazzled by titles, by the report of brilliant international alliances again. But more than that, Janey felt that she had learned something of herself. Life to a real woman, was not all a matter of taking. There must be giving, too, the devotion of a man as simple, as straight and good as Gordon Raleigh was not a thing to be laughed aside, just because he had no money. And, on the other hand, as she felt with a rush of returning self-respect, although Carlos di Rampolli was the richest man in Sicily, there was a fundamental incongruity there, there was a difference that made the thought of marriage between them obnoxious.

Janey climbed cautiously from the lumpy, odorous couch, noiselessly replenished the fire, drew the covering up over her aunt, and crept shuddering back. The rain was over, and one glance over her humped shoulder at the waste of the big black room behind the screen had shown her a bright angle of white moonlight lying across the dim shapes that were tables and chairs.

"Too much coffee!" Janey thought. "I believe I'm going to lie awake all night!" And almost immediately she fell sound asleep.

THE following morning, if it did not quite merit Fraternelli's enthusiastic adjectives of "perfect" and "June," was at least clear, or intermittently clear.

Tramontare stood above the sea, upon rocky ground that looked hopelessly unfriendly. Behind the castle rose the sharp spurs of the black mountains toward the north, lower chains of volcanic hills ringed the place to east and west, but on the south side, perhaps five miles from the castle, lay the blue sea.

The buildings themselves, for the castle ramified into something like a dozen semi-detached edifices, were imposing; the girls found no difficulty in believing the most romantic stories about them. Phœnicians, Greeks, Castilians, Normans, Bourbons, Savoyards had all taken their turn at ruling the rebellious little island, and most of them had left their imprint upon the Castello Tramontare.

Mrs. Stanley remained upon the couch by the drawing-room fire; the two younger men, Rossi and di Rampolli, had taken the automobile and one of the drivers and departed to investigate the injured car, some kilometers down the road. Count Lebretagne had not appeared.

"Let's hope that they don't get a flat tire or anything!" Janey had exclaimed, upon hearing this. "That's the most awful road I ever saw. On Aunt Nell's account I wish they had waited for us all to discuss it before they rushed off. She must get back to Palermo to-day, no matter what happens to the rest of us!"

"Your American frankness distressed Carlos very much," Fraternelli had admitted. "His father's home is sacred to a man in our country. To have his hospitality made ridiculous hurt his pride in a way that I can not express."

"But it was so obvious that his hospitality had somehow slipped a cog!" Janey had returned honestly, wide-eyed. "We couldn't sit around and wait while my aunt froze to death!"

"It was not his fault," Fraternelli had persisted seriously. "It appears that his messenger's mule died on the way. Di Rampolli will dismiss him, of course. But he was enraged last night. He felt that the honor of his house had been slighted!"

"He's very silly, then!" Janey said impatiently. "However, when they come back—and let's hope they manage to tow the second motor-car with them!—we'll tell him we didn't mean it so, at all."

"And this is what we get for putting ourselves under obligation to him!" she had added in her secret soul.

HOWEVER, the day had commenced far more felicitously than any of them had dreamed it might the preceding night, and a certain Latin mood of sweetness and idleness, the true dolce far niente, had taken hold upon them all.

"But my aunt, no matter what it costs, must be gotten back to-night," Janey had reminded Fraternelli more than once. And Fraternelli had assured her that the moment the young men returned they would start.

A woman had been building a big fire on the hearth when Janey awakened, and there had shortly been hot water and hot coffee and fresh spongy bread. Fortified by this, the girls had made Mrs. Stanley, who was suffering from fatigue and "grippy" pains, as comfortable as was possible, had folded blankets and straightened the room, with the obsequious help of voluble maids, had stood a screen about the invalid's couch, and given her such novels and newspapers as happened to be included in their luggage, and had sallied forth to see what was to be seen.

So discovered, the castello presented to them its most charming aspect. Window-sills at the castle were four feet deep, of smooth old stone. Most of the great rooms were empty, except for a tattered tapestry or a great table or bench. The girls smothered disrespectful laughter when the famous Tiepolo and Veronese frescoes were identified—dull, indistinguishable fragments of limbs and drapery, dim upon the stained distempered ceilings. The masterpieces, Janey murmured to one of her countrywomen, would have been the better for a good coat of whitewash! Some of the rooms were furnished with great cabinets, show-cases, as Dolly called them, filled with molding collections of fans, leather-work, carved figures, fabrics.

"The excavated collection is supposed to be one of the finest private collections in all Italy," Fraternelli commented.

"What good does it do?" Vivienne asked in her simple little voice.

"Only that it proves the di Rampolli family, and the San Giovanne family, to be among the oldest in the whole civilized world, signorina," Fraternelli reiterated patiently.

"Yes, and what good does that do?" Vivienne persisted, with what the other girls called her "bird-brain" manner.

"Nothing, if it means nothing," Fraternelli said with an icy glance. And Dolly told her sister later that he might just as well have knifed her.

THEY were all glad to get out of the damp, evil-smelling, haunted rooms to the fitful sunshine of the terrace, and here Mrs. Stanley was presently coaxed to join them. The girls wore their sweaters and brought rugs for the older woman. Fraternelli, perched upon the incredibly picturesque old stone railing, entertained them with romantic stories of the place for a happy and distracted hour. "But where are they? It's almost noon!" Janey interrupted the placid flow of the conversation to ask suddenly. "They started when? At nine? Shouldn't they be back?"

"I present a thousand apologies and I know that I am what you call a bad boy," said the pleasant voice of Count Lebretagne. Looking rested, fresh, sleek of hair, and with the unmistakable aspect of one who has just bathed, shaved and breakfasted well, the Frenchman came out into the sunshine of the terrace, seeming to bring with him a sort of guarantee of normality and safety. "We started with two automobiles," he added, in French, turning an inquiring glance toward Fraternelli. "We now seem to have none!"

The younger men's absence was explained to him, and he took it quite as a matter of course, thereby enabling Janey to view it more composedly.

"Now, if we but had the Paris papers, and a casino within a few minutes' walk," he remarked, balancing upon the wide, weather-corroded stone balustrade, "we might be anywhere! Cannes, Biarritz——"

"Might we at least have some bridge?" Mrs. Stanley asked with sudden hopefulness. "Have we cards?"

Fraternelli pursed his lips, shook his head regretfully.

"Playing cards are a little too modern to be found at Tramontare," he said. ("Suggesting by his manner," commented Janey with fine irony later, "that everything else, in the way of bathrooms and lights and furnace heat and mirrors and table service ought to be enough for us!")

At the time, however, she merely remarked fervently: "There may be some in my suitcase—there's a special pocket for them," and ran eagerly into the damp, heavy shade of the palace again to investigate. Anything that would amuse Aunt Nell——

The cards were found and presently a spirited game was in progress. Janey, whose lot it was to sit out a rubber, glanced stealthily at her watch. It did not do to appear too eager for their departure, but, after all, Palermo was still that inflexible hundred and sixteen miles away, and upon the wet unbroken roads five hours would be none too much to allow.

IT WAS almost two. They had frittered away a surprizing amount of time. Luncheon would be in order at any minute. A cold rush of cloud darkened the terrace and a spatter of rain broke up the game. Mrs. Stanley was bundled back to the replenished fire again and then maids began to bring trays of luncheon.

"Count Fraternelli, can you understand where the prince is? What can have happened?" the women began to ask with increasing uneasiness. Janey drew him aside when she passed him in one of the draughty hallways and faced him seriously.

"I am worried about my aunt. Tell me the truth. Where do you think they are and what are they doing?" she pleaded.

Her imperious manner, one of the charms that had marked spoiled, audacious little Janey Davenport since her adored babyhood, was softened now. Her mouth had a new line of firmness, of self-control, her eyes a troubled earnestness that was very different from their usual daring and dancing light. There was something in her aspect that made her seem a different woman from the dashing American heiress of the yacht and the flowered silk shawls, who had taken possession of the Villa Igiea.

"Signorina, one of the maids suggests that di Rampolli and Rossi themselves are towing the car to Bivona or Caltanissetta," Fraternelli suggested animatedly, after a moment's frown of concentration. "In that case they may return at any moment."

"But even if they did," she persisted, "we could hardly start for Palermo to-night?"

"Oh, no." He shook his head regretfully. "Not to-night."

"My aunt," she said in distress, "is certainly feverish. She seems to have a touch of grippe. It isn't comfortable for her here——"

"We will do what we can for her, signorina. You can understand my position—" Fraternelli pleaded.

"Oh, yes," she said, apologetically, "I do. It is dreadful for you. But my position, too," Janey resumed, with a rueful smile. "I shall feel so terrible—" Her bright eyes brimmed. She tried to smile through tears.

"The situation is not so serious," Fraternelli consoled her. "We shall start bright and early in the morning."

Agreeing, and going heavy-hearted upon her way, Janey wondered a little at the man's amiability. Surely his friends in deserting him had served him a most ungracious trick. She suspected that he himself was puzzled by their prolonged absence.

Her errand through the big halls and rooms was in pursuit of a plan of her own, kept from her aunt and the servants, kept even from Dolly and Vivienne, whose gentle, bewildered souls had already found in her a natural leader. There must be smaller and more habitable rooms at Tramontare, Janey had told herself, rooms with fireplaces that would really warm them.

As she threaded the solitary place, Janey silenced her uncomfortable fears by planning briskly.

"We'll have all the mattresses brought up and aired and warmed. The beds we won't bother about, you couldn't move them with dynamite, anyway. Then we'll keep a fire going——"

She had penetrated into a somewhat distant part of the castle, pushing open big doors, peering half-affrighted into dim, big empty rooms. Now she had reached comparatively smaller apartments, strung along in a row in medieval fashion, without hallways, each room opening into the next. In some of the windows shutters were barred, but there were one or two where the daylight fell upon dusty floors through wide-open casements.

Triumphantly, she selected one with a weather-tight window and an open fireplace. A long table was already in the room, and two stout, old square armchairs, with decaying tapestry on backs and seats.

"It would be a decent-sized room at home!" she said half aloud. "It must be fifteen by fifteen feet. Servant's rooms, of course. No real aristocrat ever entered an apartment smaller than the Pennsylvania Station in New York! We really can warm this and make it fairly comfortable, if we can get a broom and some suds——"

A distant banging noise, as if one of the great doors had closed itself, brought her heart suddenly into her mouth. Absolute and utter stillness followed the sound, and Janey could hear the drip-drip of rain outside the gloomy shuttered windows, emphasizing the unearthly lonesomeness of the place.

Exactly where was she? Exactly how did one return to the down-stairs rooms?

"Nonsense!" she reminded herself. "I can look out of a window and get my bearings that way!" And she went to the window. It was heavily barred, the iron bolts reinforced by rust and moss.

A little frightened now, and with a panicky impulse to rush wildly back across the long course that had led her here, the girl penetrated to the room beyond, just another bare, plaster-scented room like the rest.

Here the window was open, wide open, the wet air coming in and the broken shutter dangling. But there was that in the room that made Janey forget the window and that brought all her fears back in full strength. Her heart slackened to a slow, sickening beat.

There was an old, square wooden bed in a corner of the room, upon which were tumbled covers. Beside the bed were a bottle and glasses. A newspaper lay on the floor.

One of the men had slept here last night, she tried to think. But that was impossible—she had traversed twenty rooms, thirty rooms since leaving that part of the castle where they had all taken shelter like wet, storm-blown birds in the dark. Why should any one thread all this dismal emptiness to spend the cold night here alone?

SHE picked up the paper, alert, frightened eyes—ready to jump to either door.

A Naples paper—she could translate the word "Napoli" and some few of the headlines. A Neapolitan paper, here in an upper, empty room of Tramontare! Funny——

Janey wished that she were down-stairs, safely beside the fire with the others. There was something mysterious here, something unexplained. Perhaps one of the men had had it in his pocket; perhaps this dismal, damp apartment was really much closer to the main part of the castle than she supposed.

"I wish I had brought Dolly!" she whispered audibly. "I—I don't like it!"

She looked again at the paper. The date might throw some light. Possibly it was months old. This was March eighteenth—the servant, Rita, had said something of tomorrow's being the great feast of San Giuseppe. Janey swallowed hard, looked again.

It was figures, not words. There could be no mistaking figures. March sixteenth. March sixteenth, Wednesday.

"Some one was here—" the girl murmured, with a dry throat. "Some one was here, in the castle, last night. How did he get from Naples so fast? What did he want here?"

She stood still, afraid to stir, lest the noise she herself made drown out some other sinister noise—here—under the bed—or in the next room—or in the terrible, great dark wardrobe, whose tattered tapestry curtains were moving softly in the wet, fresh air that came through the open window.

Outside, the rain fell steadily, in straight gray lines. About her stretched the confusing labyrinth of dark, half-empty rooms, gloomy and menacing in twilight. And far, far away, unconscious of her danger and her need, the Saterlee girls and Aunt Nell were playing cards beside the fire.

Janey knew herself to be terrified. She made one movement toward the door, shrank back again in a terror so increased as to make her mood of the second before seem nothing.

For nearer than before, and unmistakable now, there had sounded again the heavy bang of a door. And as the detonation died away, rumbling like a pistol-shot in the gray quiet of the late afternoon, another sound succeeded it. The sound of heavy steps, coming nearer and nearer, coming straight to the room where the girl waited, trembling, panting, her lips bitten, her nostrils dilated, her eyes fixed on the door.

Continued in the January DELINEATOR

Through that door which Janey watches with such terror are coming events more thrilling than you could ever imagine. A master-bandit—who travels over mountains and sea by aeroplane—a gallant young desperado, graduate of an American university, with his own private fortress on a Sicilian mountain-peak—a man seeking revenge upon a prince and ready even to torture the woman the prince holds most dear—here are elements of the next instalment which will make you agree that "Beauty and the Beast" is the best book yet by Kathleen Norris

My Youth

Shows what Clay can do

By Edna Wallace Hopper

At my age women naturally look old. I look like a girl of 19. Thousands who see me daily on the stage envy my youthful bloom. That is largely due to Clay.

I have just returned from Paris, where women never seem to grow old. And they all give much credit to Clay.

But they use a new type Clay, white, refined and dainty, just as I do. You will find it at your toilet counter, called Edna Wallace Hopper's White Youth Clay. It is the final result of 20 years of scientific study. It combines with two Clays other needed factors.

My White Youth Clay purges the skin of all that clogs and mars it. It draws out the causes of blackheads and blemishes. It combats all lines and wrinkles. It brings the blood to the skin to nourish and revive it. The result is a rosy afterglow.

I have seen countless plain girls multiply their beauty with Youth Clay. Many older women seem to drop ten years with a single application.

No girl or woman can afford to omit it. It means too much. The results are amazing, and every use repeats them. When once you see them you will never go without them.

Let me send you a sample tube. See what it does for your complexion inside 30 minutes. My latest Beauty Book will come with it. Clip coupon now.

How's Your Husband's Disposition?

Is he irritable, moody, hard to please?

You feel discouraged, hurt—but it is probably all your own fault! Disposition depends largely on digestion—you don't cook him well-balanced meals. How Much More Your Eyes Can Say

MORE than all else, well-defined eyebrows and luxuriant lashes create the beauty and expression of your face. The slight darkening, the accentuation of line and shadow is the secret.

Maybelline

makes scant eyebrows and lashes appear naturally dark, long and luxurious. Instantly and unfailingly the eyes appear larger, deeper and more brilliant. The improvement will delight you.

Maybelline may now be had in either solid form or waterproof liquid form. Both forms are absolutely harmless, being used regularly by beautiful women in all parts of the world. Either form may be had in black or brown. 75c AT YOUR DEALERS or direct from us, postpaid. Be sure to accept only genuine "MAYBELLINE" and your satisfaction is assured. Tear this out NOW as ■ reminder.

6430—The 1925 model evening wrap harmonizes with the dress. This wrap has a deep armhole, a pocket on the lining and is worn wrapped around or in straight-line style. Velvet, heavy satin, etc., are effective in brilliant colors and practical in black lined with silver cloth, gray crêpe de Chine or satin. For an afternoon wrap use short-nap coatings, velvet, etc.

36 bust requires 2⅞ yards 50-inch brocade.

The coat-wrap is for ladies 32 to 44 bust, also misses.

6399—The youthful cast of this slip-over dress is attributable to the smart separate bolero and the straight gathered skirt set on at a low waistline. Use lace flouncing with matching Georgette, crêpe satin, etc.; or use Georgette, crêpe de Chine or crêpe satin with lace edging. The drop skirt is used under transparent materials. Lower edge of skirt 1¾ yard; of drop skirt 44 inches.

36 bust requires 3 yards 28-inch lace flouncing and 2⅞ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6477—The bordered frock finds a way to flare by inserting a godet at each side. This slip-over one-piece dress fits closely at the hipline, has a straight lower edge and is made of bordered wide crêpe satin, Canton crêpe or satin and faille, or 54-inch ombré velvet with matching Georgette, etc. Lower edge 2⅜ yards.

36 bust requires 1⅜ yard of 54-inch bordered velvet brocade, with 1½ yard 39-inch Georgette.

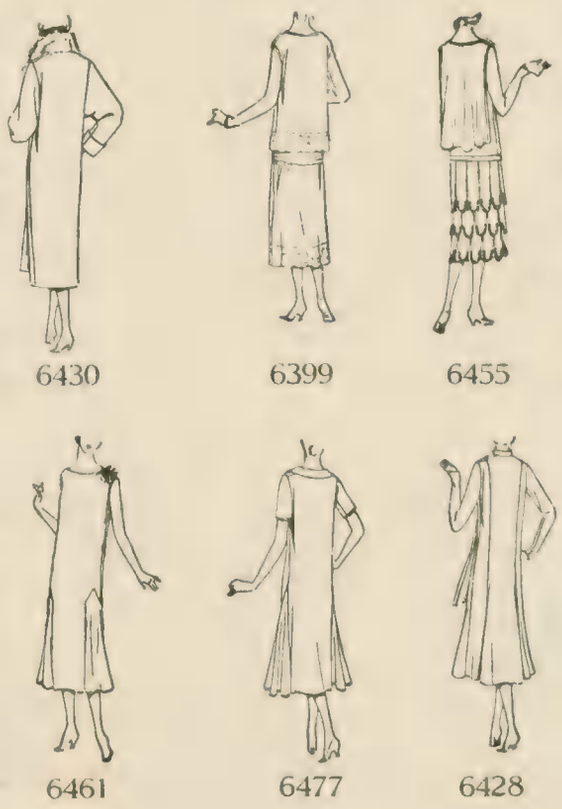
The dress is charming for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6428—The flared Princess dress is the latest thing in silhouettes. Use crêpe satin, satin Canton, plain satin, satin faille, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine, etc. For day wear this slip-over frock has sleeves, normal armholes and a V-shaped or round neckline; for evening, a lower neck and cut-down armholes. Lower edge 2¼ yards.

36 bust requires 3¼ yards 39-inch velvet.

The princess dress is for ladies 32 to 48 bust.

6455—Paris says "ribbon skirts" and gets this effect by loose narrow panels. Use satin Canton, crêpe de Chine, crêpe Roma or Georgette with rhinestones, crystal beads, etc., for this slip-over one-piece evening dress with cut-down armholes. For day wear make it with sleeves and normal armholes. It fits closely at the hipline and may be made without the back cape.



36 bust requires 4⅛ yards 39-inch crêpe satin. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is smart for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6461—Pointed interest is taken by the circular flare in the outline of its attachment at the back and sides of a slip-over dress. The front is in one piece and the dress fits closely at the hipline. Use satin Canton, soft satin, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe de Chine, Georgette, etc., with hand-made flower of matching or contrasting Georgette.

36 bust requires 3⅜ yards 39-inch crêpe satin. Lower edge 2¾ yards.

The dress is attractive for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

Here's a funny way to gain or reduce but it's amazing thousands by its astonishing results

We ask you, please, to test this simple safe way to build a perfect body. It will change your weight at least five pounds the first two weeks or the test is free. Simply send the coupon.

WOMEN have found a new way to reduce. An entirely different way that is safe and pleasant, yet surprisingly simple. You do not starve, nor take dangerous medicines nor exhaust yourself by exercise. Not at all. This new way is purely natural. It permits nature to restore the beautiful and irresistible figure that was yours as a girl. It gives the firm, supple body whose lines are the envy and admiration of everyone.

Science's gift to every woman

This marvelous system of weight control has been prepared by well known physicians and beauty scientists. And with this system, they say, one thing is necessary: to weigh yourself every day under the same conditions without clothing. These authorities recommend a new kind of scale—the Health-O-Meter Automatic Scale. It offers you the one means of scientific weight control.

Now the manufacturers of the Health-O-Meter will tell you how you may have the famous weight control system free if you will write immediately. You must act at once. Use the coupon.

6428—10336—Suggesting the line of the figure without actually fitting it, the flared princess dress presents a new silhouette. Embroidery follows the flaring hem-line. Work in contrast. Use crêpe satin, satin Canton, plain satin, satin faille, crêpe faille, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine, etc., with contrasting ribbon facing for tie collar. This slip-over dress may have a round neck. For evening, cut the armhole down and make the neck lower. Lower edge 2¼ yards.

36 bust requires 4⅛ yards 35-inch velvet.

It is for ladies 32 to 48 bust.

6427—10361—Shirred Georgette godets give to this one-piece frock the flare that Fashion loves. Embroidery gives it elegance. Work in one-stitch. The dress slips on over the head, fits closely at the hipline and may be made of heavy crêpe de Chine, satin Canton, satin faille, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, etc., with matching Georgette. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 3⅜ yards 39-inch crêpe satin and 1¼ yard 39-inch Georgette.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6447—5416—A most attractive slip-over frock attaches a circular flare across its back and sides but keeps its front in one piece. Use crêpe satin, satin Canton, soft satin, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, etc. The smart tam-o'-shanter may be made of velours, duvetyn, heavy flannel, velvet, taffeta, satin, etc. Lower edge 2½ yards.

36 bust and 22 inches head measure require 3⅜ yards 39-inch novelty crêpe satin with no up or down (flare cut crosswise) for dress and ¾ yard 27-inch velvet for tam.

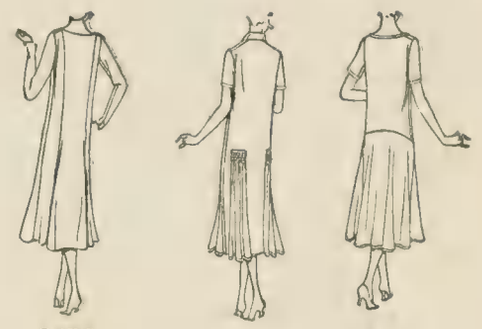
The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust; tam for ladies, misses, girls and children.

6429—Here fan-shaped shirrings capture the attention of the critical. This tie-around frock is one-piece in type, slightly draped, and has soft shirred fulness at the shoulder. Use crêpe satin, heavy crêpe de Chine or broché crêpe satin with harmonizing Georgette; or use chiffon velvet with matching Georgette.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 40-inch crêpe satin and 1¼ yard 39-inch Georgette.

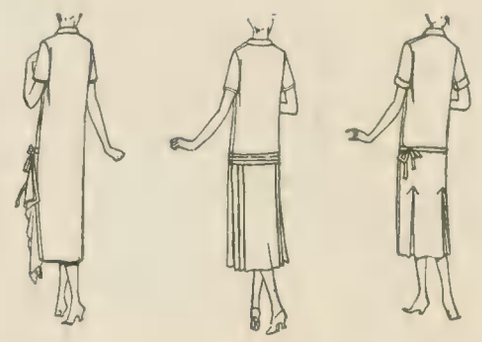
The dress is smart for ladies 36 to 48 bust.

6457—A new handling of plaits is shown here on a smart frock. A plaited lower part is attached to the back, also to part of the one-piece front, giving a front tunic effect. This dress slips on over the head. Use light-weight cashmere, serge, wool crêpe, light-weight kasha, camel's-hair twills, etc., or crêpe satin, satin Canton, flat crêpe, etc. Lower edge with plaits drawn out 1¾ yard.



36 bust requires 2½ yards 54-inch twill.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.



6469—The new striped wide bordered wools and striped wide half-and-half wools make up smartly in a straight-line frock. At each side of the front and back a plait is inserted and the dress slips on over the head. You may also use twills, worsteds, cashmere, wool crêpe, light-weight kasha, camel's-hair twills, light-weight tweeds, heavy satin, etc. It fits closely at the hipline, is one-piece in type and has a straight lower edge.

36 bust requires 2⅜ yards 54-inch bordered wool. Lower edge with plaits out 2⅛ yards.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6418—The inverted plait at each side of the front and back and the yoke give individuality to this slip-over frock. Use serge with white linen or rep collar, wool crêpe with silk crêpe, etc., or flannel, flat crêpe, etc.

8 years requires 1½ yard 54-inch twill.

The dress is for juniors and girls 6 to 15.

6406—426—This little girl in a slip-over frock and separate bloomers dresses her doll in rompers and sunbonnet.

5 years requires 1½ yard 35-inch velveteen and 1 yard 39-inch crêpe de Chine. A 22-inch doll requires 1 yard 32-inch chambray and ⅜ yard 32-inch contrasting material.

The dress is for girls 2 to 6 years; the rompers and sunbonnet for girl dolls with large bodies, 12 to 26 inches.

6394—Separate bloomers hide under this prettily smocked slip-over dress. The lower edge is straight and the collar and cuffs may be detachable. Use crêpe de Chine, silk or cotton pongee, cotton broadcloth, etc.

7 years requires 1¾ yard 54-inch wool jersey.

The dress is for girls 6 to 10 years.

6460—Serge, wool crêpe, flannel, velveteen, wool rep, etc., make this one-piece slip-over dress, while plaid or check of the same material or of silk makes the godets inserted at each side of the front and back.

12 years requires 1½ yard 54-inch twill and ½ yard 54-inch plaid.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15.

6446—10361—The bishop sleeve and plait inserted at front, back and sides give this one-piece slip-over dress a grown-up air. The embroidery is smart. Work in color. Use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, rayon, etc., with contrasting; or use soft twills, etc.

12 years requires 2½ yards 39-inch heavy crêpe de Chine.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15.

6452—The ripple of a two-piece circular skirt attached to a long body endears this frock to young fashionables. It slips on over the head and is made of Canton crêpe, flat crêpe, taffeta, radium, etc., with contrasting, etc.

12 years takes 1⅝ yard 54-inch soft twill.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15.

6388—There is intriguing youthfulness in the separate bolero and the straight skirt smartly box-plaited and attached to a long body. Make this slip-over frock of checks with matching or harmonizing plain wool or silk crêpe; or use twills, serge, wool crêpe, or flannel with striped or plaid, etc.

10 years requires 1⅞ yard 44-inch wool plaid and 1⅛ yard 35-inch velveteen.

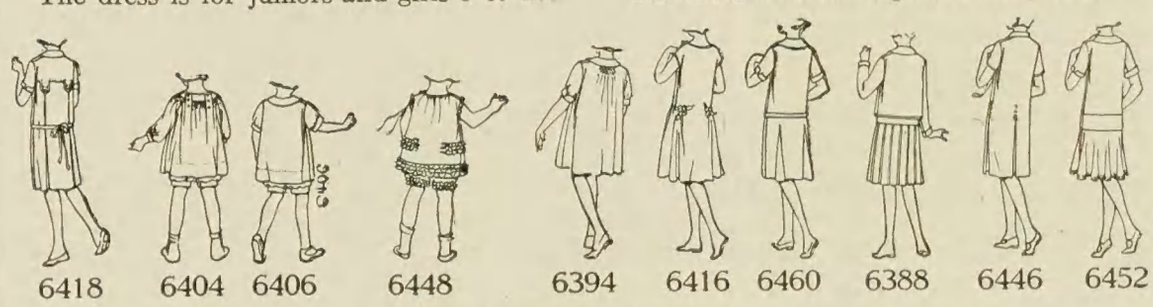
The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15.

6416—There is a heart-catching quaintness to a frock in basque effect. Use radium, crêpe de Chine, etc., for this one-piece slip-over dress with hand-made flowers of contrasting Georgette and leaves and girdle of silver ribbon. The lower edge is straight.

12 years requires 2 yards 35-inch taffeta.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15.

6404—With charming abandon a very brief slip-over dress exposes both knee and separate bloomers. Smocked and box-plaited, it is made of crêpe de Chine, silk or cotton pongee, plain or pin-dot voile. It has raglan style sleeves and a straight lower edge.



4 years requires 2½ yards 32-inch pongee.

The dress is for little girls 2 to 6 years.

6448—A party-going frock of many frills slips on over the head. The lower edge is straight and the bloomers are separate. Use silk or cotton Georgette, cotton voile, etc., of one material or with Val-lace frills; or use pin-dot swiss, etc.

5 years requires 2¼ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

The dress is for little girls 2 to 6 years.

OTHER VIEWS ARE ON PAGE 31

6442—The small designs of printed silk or cotton pongee are entrancing for a little slip-over frock with a straight lower edge. Or use cotton voile, crêpe de Chine, pin-dot swiss, etc. The bloomers are separate.

5 years requires 2½ yards 32-inch printed silk pongee and ⅜ yard 32-inch plain.

The dress is for little girls 2 to 6 years.

6392—10232—With puffed sleeves and a straight lower edge this tiny frock is adorable in lawn, nainsook, etc., with Val-lace edging, or in crêpe de Chine, fine cotton crêpe, etc. The embroidery is fine. Work in eyelets, etc.

1 year requires 1⅜ yard 36-inch batiste.

The dress is for little girls and tiny boys ½ to 3 years.

6414—Delightful to make is a slip-over frock frilled even to its separate bloomers. The lower edge is straight. Use silk or cotton Georgette, cotton voile, etc., of one material or with Val-lace and bows, etc., of harmonizing ribbon.

5 years requires 2¼ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

The dress is for little girls 2 to 6 years.

6444—A plaited section is inserted at each side of this smart one-piece dress. It slips on over the head and is made of soft serge, soft wool crêpe, light-weight flannel, etc., with contrasting; or of Canton crêpe, crêpe de Chine, pongee, etc.

12 years requires 1⅝ yard 54-inch twill.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15.

6466—A very smart two-piece school dress slips a blouse over a straight skirt that is attached to an underbody. It has an inverted plait at the front and back. The embroidery is quaint. Work in contrast. Use light-weight wool jersey, twills, flat crêpe, etc.

12 years requires 1¾ yard 54-inch flannel.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6454—10312—Light-weight flannel, etc., with collar and cuffs of white piqué, linen or contrasting flannel, is smart for this one-piece slip-over dress. Or use crêpe de Chine, etc. The embroidery is attractive.

7 years requires 1¼ yard 54-inch wool jersey.

The dress is for girls 6 to 10 years.

6390—One looks one's fascinating best at parties in a circular flare frock with a yoke. Use crêpe de Chine or taffeta with matching velvet ribbon. The tiny flowers of contrasting ribbon are easily made.

7 years requires 1⅞ yard 39-inch crêpe de Chine (cut crosswise).

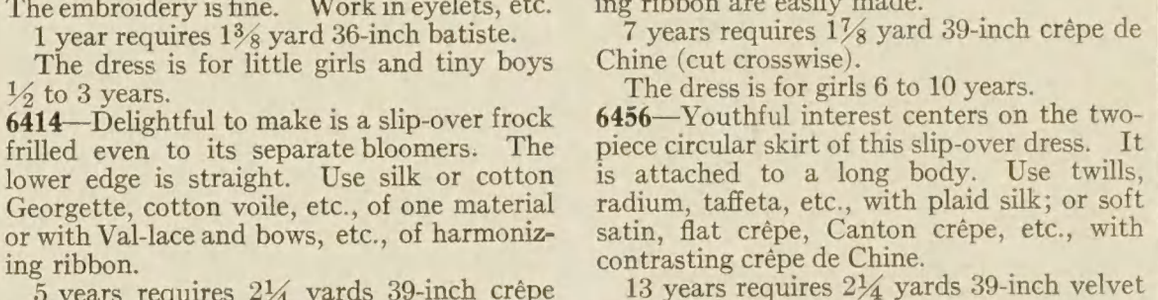
The dress is for girls 6 to 10 years.

6456—Youthful interest centers on the two-piece circular skirt of this slip-over dress. It is attached to a long body. Use twills, radium, taffeta, etc., with plaid silk; or soft satin, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, etc., with contrasting crêpe de Chine.

13 years requires 2¼ yards 39-inch velvet and ½ yard 35-inch plaid taffeta.

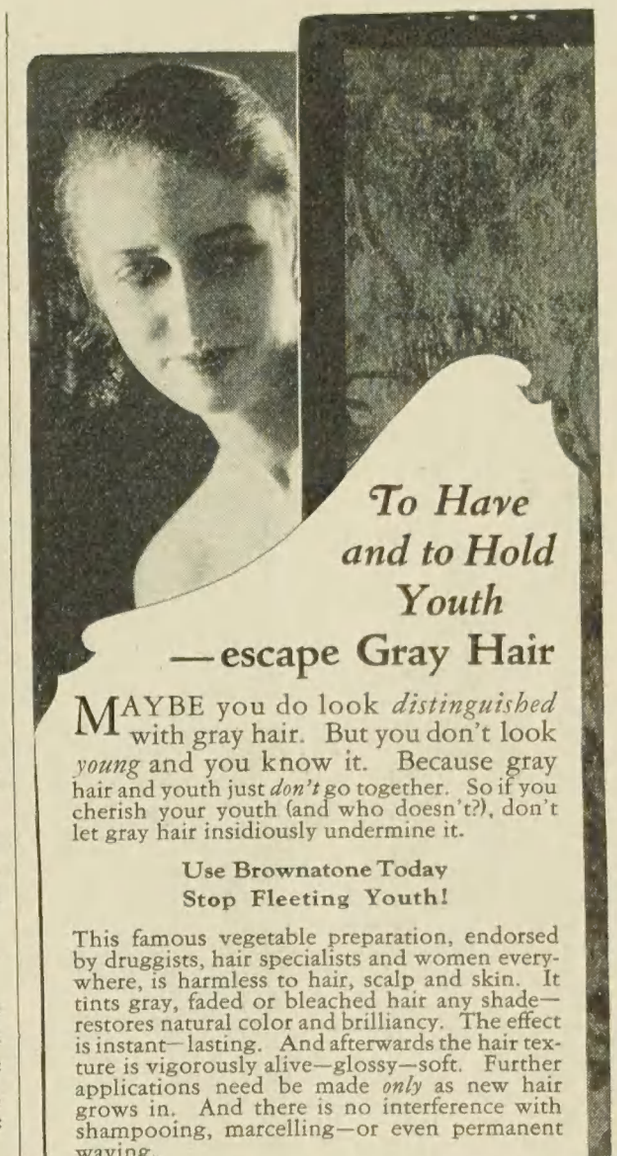
The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15.

6378—10331—The jabot is an effective trimming on a one-piece slip-over frock of Canton crêpe, flat crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine, rayon, etc., with Georgette. The embroidery is effective. Work in contrast.



12 years requires 2¼ yards 35-inch velveteen and ¾ yard 39-inch Georgette.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15.



6470—10356—Flying loose panels give animation to a small one-piece frock of slip-over type. They are attached to each side front and back. Use crêpe satin, crêpe de Chine, etc., or flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, velveteen, etc., with matching Georgette. The embroidery is easy. Work in one-stitch, etc.

13 years takes 2½ yards 39-inch Georgette.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15.

To Have and to Hold Youth
—escape Gray Hair

MAYBE you do look distinguished with gray hair. But you don't look young and you know it. Because gray hair and youth just don't go together. So if you cherish your youth (and who doesn't?), don't let gray hair insidiously undermine it.

Use Brownatone Today
Stop Fleeting Youth!

This famous vegetable preparation, endorsed by druggists, hair specialists and women everywhere, is harmless to hair, scalp and skin. It tints gray, faded or bleached hair any shade—restores natural color and brilliancy. The effect is instant—lasting. And afterwards the hair texture is vigorously alive—glossy—soft. Further applications need be made only as new hair grows in. And there is no interference with shampooing, marcelling—or even permanent waving.

Two colors, shading from sunniest blonde to darkest brunette—50c and $1.50 bottles at drug and toilet counters everywhere.

A small trial bottle of Brownatone, to test its merits, will be sent to you for 10c—which covers mailing and packing charges.

Milder Musterole for Small Children

Thousands of mothers tell us they would not be without Children's Musterole, the new, milder form of good old Musterole especially prepared for babies and small children.

At night, when awakened by the warning, croupy cough, rub the clean, white ointment gently over the child's throat and chest.

Children's Musterole, like regular Musterole, penetrates the skin with a warming tingle and goes quickly to the seat of the trouble.

It does not blister like the old-fashioned mustard plaster and it is not messy to apply.

Made from pure oil of mustard, it takes the kink out of stiff necks, makes sore throats well, stops croupy coughs and colds.

Some People Don't Like Us

An exchange of opinion about Christmas-giving is the subject of a whole editorial page elsewhere in this issue. One letter in our files invariably comes to mind whenever the subject is brought up. Fortunately, the writer of it didn't stop with an expression of her opinion of Christmas-giving, but generously threw in a comment or two on babies and the function of a woman's magazine. We say "fortunately" because the paragraphs of criticism give us a clue to the general bias of the lady's mind. We leave to you the choice of envying her highly efficient disposition of the whole business of gift-giving or siding with the advocates of the old-fashioned Christmas. The letter is from a New England woman and is copied down here verbatim: "Years ago," it reads, "I stopped this gift foolishness. Forbade them, absolutely, sending me anything. Those under five years of age, I send a new silver quarter, those from five to twelve, fifty cents, from twelve to eighteen, a dollar, from eighteen to ninety, a card. Nothing more. The postage helps inflate the treasury of 'Uncle Samuel' to such an extent that the mail-carriers howl for more pay. I don't like THE DELINEATOR as well as I used to. Twenty years or more ago it used to tell people how to make dresses, cloaks and bonnets. There is too much twaddle about babies. There are thousands of them born every year that would be better off and the world better off if they had never seen the light of day. If a few of them die there are plenty more where they came from. It is time women were taught that the knob above their shoulders was put there for some other purpose than to daub with grease and mud."

The Mad King of Bavaria

Some of our older readers will recognize in Dixie Willson's story, "Moon-Rose," in this issue, a chapter of history that was closed dramatically in their own youth. One such friend has already recalled reading in the papers some forty years ago a little news item running something like this: "King Ludwig of Bavaria has been missed from his palace for several days and no one has been able to locate his whereabouts. His household (consisting of Herr Richard Wagner) is very much concerned about the king's mysterious disappearance." So far as the historic personages are concerned, Miss Willson has adhered pretty closely to the facts. Ludwig (Louis II) was an eccentric ruler, with odd notions of the conduct becoming a king. A bachelor and a recluse, he held himself aloof from his subjects and indulged to the fullest his devotion to the arts. He was so infatuated with the genius of his protégé, Richard Wagner, as to cause his advisers grave concern over their ruler's neglect of important affairs of state. The oppressive weight of taxation required to finance his personal extravagances finally reached the point where his ministers could no longer endure it. They officially declared him insane, and three days later "the mad king" drowned himself in the Starnberger Sea.

The Dog In Fiction

There are dog-fanciers, particularly those addicted to the cult of the collie, who would no more miss a dog story by Albert Payson Terhune than they would an opportunity to discuss the merits of their favorite breed. And if you have ever listened in on the pros and cons of an argumentative group of dog breeders you know what that means. There are several reasons why Mr. Terhune writes a capital dog story. One is that he has been devoted to dogs for the greater part of half a century, and at his home in Pompton Lakes, New Jersey, he and Mrs. Terhune breed magnificent prize-winning collies for the bench shows. Of course every man who knows and loves dogs can't write stories about them; but Mr. Terhune has developed a natural faculty by intensive experience as a newspaper man, novelist, librettist, short-story writer and motion-picture playwright. He has stocked his story-teller's pack handsomely in the course of an intensely interesting career that is reported at first hand in his book, "Now That I'm Fifty," which appeared about a year ago. All this is preliminary to saying that a series of dog stories by Mr. Terhune will appear in THE DELINEATOR from time to time beginning with next month's issue. In our opinion no one else does dog stories quite so well as the author of "Lad: A Dog" and "Buff: A Collie."

$2,000 IN PRIZES!

"What is the matter with the teaching profession and how may its evils be cured?"

For the best answers to this question THE DELINEATOR is offering $2,000 in prizes, as follows:

To Teachers: A first prize of $500, a second of $300, and a third of $200.

To Parents (and others not teachers, but interested in education): A first prize of $500, a second of $300, and a third of $200.

This contest was fully discussed on the editorial page of the October issue. You do not have to be an experienced writer to take part in it. We merely want you to search your own mind and experience and tell us, quite simply, one or more reasons why, in your opinion, over 110,000 teachers deserted the teaching profession last year, and why every year a smaller percentage of college graduates are choosing teaching as a life work. If you are one of those who have deserted it, give your own experience; if not, give the experience of your friends.

The following are some of the well-known men and women who will act as judges in this contest:

David Starr Jordan, President Emeritus, Leland-Stanford University.
Ada Comstock, President of Radcliffe College.
Livingston Farrand, President of Cornell University.
William McAndrew, Superintendent of Schools, Chicago.
Katharine Lee Bates, Professor of English Literature, Wellesley College; author of "America the Beautiful."
Angelo Patri, Principal of Public School Number 45, New York City; author of "A Schoolmaster of the Great City," etc.
Mrs. A. H. Reeve, President of the National Congress of Parents and Teachers.
Mary McSkimmon, President of the National Education Association.
John James Tigert, United States Commissioner of Education.
Edwin Lee Hulett, Dean of St. Lawrence University.
Mrs. William Brown Meloney, Editor of THE DELINEATOR.

RULES FOR THE CONTEST

Before starting to write, read carefully the following rules, for if your paper does not conform to them, it can not be considered for a prize:

1. Manuscripts must not be over one thousand words in length, must be typewritten, and must be on only one side of the paper. They will not be judged on literary merit, but on their sincerity, insight, the conviction they carry and their constructive suggestions.

2. Manuscripts must bear the name and address of the sender and the statement as to whether or not the sender is a teacher. In case of a tie for any of the prizes each contestant who ties will receive the full amount of the prize tied for.

3. No manuscript will be returned unless accompanied by a stamped and self-addressed envelope.

4. Manuscripts must be addressed to "Prize Contest Editor, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.," and must be received by us on or before January 7, 1926.

5. Prizes will be announced in THE DELINEATOR for June, 1926.

6. Prize-winning papers are the property of THE DELINEATOR. The magazine also reserves the right to purchase, at its regular rates, and to publish any manuscripts submitted in this contest which are not prize-winners.

MIX and SERVE

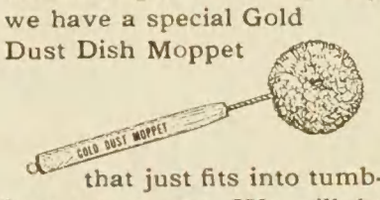
Edited with Willing Hands and a Mean Pencil by a Mere Man

AS ONE who never wearies of applauding the efforts of the never sufficiently praised sex to exercise its talents in fields hitherto monopolized by men, it delights us to report that Berlin, Germany, has the only women's fire brigade in the world ◈◈◈ The members take great pride in their efficiency. Recently the brigade was called out by an alarm from a fashionable millinery shop ◈◈◈ The captain ordered the firewomen to turn on the water. The women looked at the hats—and refused. Instead, they rushed into the flaming shop, carefully rescued the chapeaux, and then proceeded to put out the fire in a very workmanlike way ◈◈◈ We don't know that it matters, but one of our newspaper friends who "covered" the recent attempts to swim the English Channel reports that the real reason why one of the lady contestants left the water was because the thought of the thick grease with which her body was protected from the cold gave her nausea and because she was distracted by the "disgusting" sea creatures that swarmed about her ◈◈◈ From Los Angeles, California, comes a newspaper item about an aged eccentric who disposed of a half-million-dollar estate in a will written with a pencil on the hem of a white petticoat. We are not so much interested in the validity of the document as we are curious to know where even a millionaire could have found a petticoat last Summer ◈◈◈ We predict a promising future for the substitute librarian in Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania, who was asked for a book of poems by Stevenson and "named after a typewriter." The young lady turned to a near-by shelf and handed out a copy of "Underwoods" ◈◈◈ Resourcefulness of another kind is reported from Cedar Grove, Canada, where a woman was annoyed by her pet dog's habit of running the streets at night ◈◈◈ To prevent him from being run over by automobiles she strapped a dry-cell battery to his back and attached a tiny red light to his tail. Touring motorists give him a wide berth when they see the dancing danger signal in their path at night ◈◈◈ A Utica, New York, young man who tried to say it with flowers finds himself in an unprecedented fix. He informed his fiancée, aged twenty-four, that he was sending her for her birthday a rose for every year of her life. To the florist he gave the order to send two dozen of the finest roses obtainable. "He is a very good customer," remarked the florist to the assistant who was packing the bouquet, "so put in an extra half-dozen." Of course it was inevitable that another engagement should go on the rocks ◈◈◈ One of the admirable foreign customs that we advocate from time to time as worthy of American adoption is the dot. Even in Lapland, it appears, men who go in for matrimony expect some material evidence of value received. There the sensible custom is for the father to present his infant daughter with a reindeer. By the time the girl reaches a marriageable age the deer's progeny constitute a herd of sufficient value to relieve the prospective husband's anxiety about providing for a rainy day ◈◈◈ Ever alert, as we are, to uphold the hand of Celia Caroline Cole and to pass along sound beauty doctrine to our fair pewholders, we quote a paragraph from a pamphlet issued by the British National Publicity Council. "No dressing-table is complete without rouge these days," it reads, "but the best kind consists of creamed carrots, which we call nature's own paint or complexion brush. Eat them cooked or raw. No matter how tender or delicate your skin, you can use yellow carrots, cooked in milk, twice a week. By mixing these two colors within the body a promising color will appear upon the cheeks of almost any person whose health is any way near normal" ◈◈◈ A retired high-wire performer, Myrtle Ross, who died recently in Alhambra, California, directed that her pet dog, Snowball, be chloroformed, cremated, and his ashes mingled with hers at burial ◈◈◈ One of the priceless stained-glass treasures of the cathedral of Yorkminister, England, has been restored after a century of neglect. The "five sisters" window commemorates five women of medieval times, known only by their Christian names, who were skilled workers in tapestry. ◈◈◈ The far-sighted reader who is beginning to think of her Christmas shopping list will remember to mention THE DELINEATOR when writing to advertisers ◈◈◈

GOLD DUST

Sparkling Glassware!



HERE'S the way the experts get that wonderful sparkle. See how easy it is—Gold Dust in hot water—but not too hot—a dip of the glass into the solution—a dab with the dish mop—then dry without rinsing—simplicity itself! No need to put hands in the hot water!

Ornamental glassware too, is easily cleaned with Gold Dust—because it dissolves the greasy dust film that adheres to it.

Let the Gold Dust Twins do your work

Special

To make glass cleaning easy we have a special Gold Dust Dish Moppet that just fits into tumblers, vases, etc. We will be glad to send you one for 5c and the twins cut from a Gold Dust package.

Gold Dust Corporation

NOTE—The stain on the inside of flower vases can be easily removed by letting a strong Gold Dust solution stand in the vase a few minutes before using the dish mop.

This is but one of the countless ways Gold Dust helps about the house.

From attic to cellar it makes all house cleaning easier and leaves a look of newness on everything it touches.

It's New!

—the improved scouring powder. It's "sudsy," soft and smooth. Cleans, scours, polishes and purifies—all at one time. No disagreeable odor.

83% of these New York State Doctors say—"Cream of Tartar baking powder is most healthful"

930 REPRESENTATIVE New York State doctors recently expressed their opinions on the healthfulness of different types of baking powder.

772 of them—or 83%—said:

"Cream of Tartar baking powder is best from a healthful point of view."

PRECISELY this same preference was previously declared by 81% of a similar group of physicians in New England and by 82% of a group of dietitians in hospitals throughout the country.

This remarkable agreement among experts is a convincing testimonial to the preeminent wholesomeness of Cream of Tartar, the principal ingredient of Royal Baking Powder.

From the earliest days of good cookery—before they were able to get baking powder ready-prepared—housewives made their cakes and biscuits light and tender with a mixture of soda and Cream of Tartar.

This Cream of Tartar is a choice, costly ingredient, derived from luscious grapes and imported into this country from the famous, sunny grape lands that border the Mediterranean. Because of its costliness—and the extra labor involved in getting it—cheaper substitutes are sometimes used for this precious Cream of Tartar.

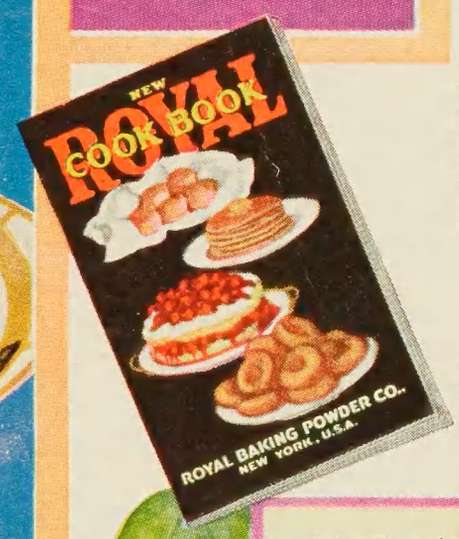
But Royal has never departed from its high standard. For more than fifty years The Royal Baking Powder Company has continued to import Cream of Tartar for Royal Baking Powder, so that housewives might always depend on getting the wholesome leavening agent which makes their cakes and biscuits so deliciously fluffy and tender, with no trace of bitter taste.

Today Royal is known throughout the world—used in millions of kitchens daily wherever housewives are most critical of the flavor and healthfulness of the foods they serve—the baking powder which doctors, dietitians and domestic science experts, without hesitation, recommend.

Made of Pure Cream of Tartar. Contains no alum. Leaves no bitter taste.

2¢ worth insures success

Yet Royal is not costly to use. It takes only 2c worth of Royal to make a large layer cake lusciously light and tender. Such a little to assure your success with all the other ingredients that go into cakes and biscuits—it surely would be false economy to try to get on with anything less than the best!



ROYAL SPONGE CAKE

Sponge cake made with Royal has the tender foamy texture and delicately rich flavor that blends so deliciously with fresh fruits or with ice cream. Whip the eggs with a wire whip in a long, light, over-motion to insure the finest texture.
